Charge.—The charge should always state the nature of the office, held by the accused so as to make him a public servant,⁹ and the name of the person from whom the gratification was obtained.¹⁰ It should run thus :—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, being a public servant in the—Department, directly accepted from (state the name), for another party (state the name), a gratification other than legal remuneration, as a motive for forbearing to do an official act, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 161 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.¹¹

Punishment.—A simple order to refund a bribe is quite inadequate to the gravity of the offence under this section.¹² The Law Commissioners observe : “The punishment of fine will, we think, be found very efficacious in cases of this description, if the Judges exercise the power given them as they ought to do, and compel the delinquent to deliver up the whole of his ill-gotten wealth”.¹³

In apportioning the punishment in bribery cases the Court is entitled to take into consideration the fact that the corruption of the nature of which the accused has been convicted is undoubtedly widely prevalent not only amongst the class of subordinate officials to which he belongs, but also in much higher places.¹⁴

Where a trap is laid to catch a bribe-giver, a sentence of imprisonment can be imposed.¹⁵

Separate convictions.—Where a certain sum of money is paid to a public servant as illegal gratification on one day and a certain sum on another day for the same purpose, the offence of receiving illegal gratification becomes a continuous offence and there ought not to be separate convictions for offences under this section and s. 165.¹⁶

162. Whoever accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept, or attempts to obtain, from any person, for himself or for any other person¹, any gratification whatever as a motive or reward for inducing, by corrupt or illegal means, any public servant to do or to forbear to do any official act, or in the exercise of the official functions of such public servant to show favour or disfavour to any person, or to render or attempt to render any service or disservice to any person, with the Central or any Provincial Government or Legislature, or with any public servant, as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

inducing, by corrupt or illegal means, a public servant to forbear to do a certain official act, is punishable under this section.¹⁷ Under this section the public servant is to be induced by corrupt or illegal means,. The next section deals with the case where the public servant is induced by personal influence.

To admit solicitation of a bribe by a third person without the privity or connivance of the public servant concerned as an excuse for giving a bribe to such public servant is an absolute absurdity.¹⁸

1. 'For any other person'.—These words must be read so as to include every one other than the actual recipient of the gratification.¹⁹

Amendment.—The words "or with any member of . . . University" were inserted by Act XVIII of 1888, s. 18 (2).

The words "Central or any Provincial Government or Legislature" were substituted for the words "Legislative or Executive Government of India, or with the Government of any Presidency, or with any Lieutenant Governor" by the Government of India (Adaption of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma, the words "Legislature or the Government" were substituted for the same words by the Government of Burma (Adaption of Laws) Order, 1937.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused accepted or obtained, or agreed to accept, or attempted to obtain, from some one, for himself or for some one else, a gratification.

(2) That he accepted, etc., the same, as a motive or reward to induce by corrupt or illegal means, a public servant (a) to do or forbear to do an official act; or (b) to show, in the exercise of his official functions, favour or disfavour to some person; or (c) to render, or attempt to render, any service or disservice to some person, with the Central or Provincial Government, etc., or with any public servant as such.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

A conviction under this section cannot be had if the evidence does not show the person or persons from whom the gratification was obtained, or the public servant to be influenced in the exercise of his public functions.²⁰

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, being a public servant in the —Department, accepted (or obtained, or agreed to accept, or attempted to obtain) from—for yourself (or for —,) a gratification (this should be specified) as a motive or reward for inducing, by corrupt or illegal means,—a public servant, to do (or to forbear to do) an official act, viz.—[or to show favour (or disfavour) to—] [or to render (or attempt to render) a service (or disservice) to—] with the Central (or Provincial) Government (or Legislature or with a public servant to wit—) and thereby committed an offence under s. 162 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

or with any public servant, as such, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

ILLUSTRATION.

An advocate who receives a fee for arguing a case before a Judge ; a person who receives pay for arranging and correcting a memorial addressed to Government, setting forth the services and claims of the memorialist ; a paid agent for a condemned criminal, who lays before the Government statements tending to show that the condemnation was unjust,—are not within this section, inasmuch as they do not exercise or profess to exercise personal influence.

COMMENT.

Section 162 and this section apply to cases where the person exercising corrupt or undue influence takes gratification from a third person. If he does so without receiving any gratification no offence will be committed under either of these sections. He may, however, be guilty as an abettor of the offence under s. 161.

“This clause [s. 163] is much more comprehensive than the English law, which appears to punish private persons taking reward for influencing public officers, only when their influence is used to procure office for a party”.²¹

Under s. 162 the gratification is taken, in order ‘by corrupt or illegal means’, to influence a public servant. Under this section it is taken for the ‘exercise of personal influence’ with a public servant. Both these sections extend also to attempts.

The accused accepted a sum of money from A for attempting to abet the acceptance by the wife of a public servant of a sum of money with a view to inducing her by personal influence to induce her husband to show favour to A in the exercise of his official functions. There was proof that there was an offer of money but not of actual payment to her. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section and s. 161.²²

Amendment.—The words “or with any member of University” were inserted by Act XVIII of 1887, s. 18(2).

The words “Central or any Provincial Government or Legislature” were substituted for the words “Legislative or Executive Government of India, or with the Government of any Presidency, or with any Lieutenant-Governor” by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma, the words “Legislature or the Government” were substituted for the same words by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as for s. 162 except that in (2) proof of “personal influence” should be given instead of “corrupt or illegal means”.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—See s. 162 and substitute for “by corrupt or illegal means” the words “by the exercise of personal influence”.

164. Whoever, being a public servant, in respect of whom either of the offences defined in the last two preceding sections is committed, abets the offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Punishment for abetment by public servant of offences defined in section 162 or 163.

ILLUSTRATION.

with imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or with fine, or with both. A is punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section punishes abetment by a public servant of offences mentioned in ss. 162 and 163 when committed in respect of himself.

This section is one of the 'express provisions' made by the Code for the punishment of abetment, which are referred to in s. 109 and other sections of Chapter V. Enhanced punishment is provided for an offence which would have been punishable under the provisions of abetment of an offence.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was a public servant.

(2) That as such he abetted an offence punishable under s. 162 or this section. Establish abetment under s. 107.

(3) That an offence under s. 162 or this section was committed.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compendable—Court of Session, Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary before prosecution is launched.²³

That you, being a public servant in the——Department, abetted the commission of the offence punishable under s. 162 (or s. 163) by——, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 164 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (omit these words if not committed to Court of Session)] on the said charge.

165. Whoever, being a public servant, accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain, for himself, or for any other person, any valuable thing without consideration, or for a consideration which he knows to be inadequate, from any person whom he knows to have been, or to be, or to be likely to be concerned in any proceeding or business transacted or about to be transacted by such public servant, or having any connection with the official functions of himself or of any public servant to whom he is subordinate, or from any person whom he knows to be interested in or related to the person so concerned, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Public servant obtaining valuable thing, without consideration, from person concerned in proceeding or business transacted by such public servant.

A has obtained a valuable thing from Z without adequate consideration.

(b) A, a Judge, buys of Z, who has a cause pending in A's Court, Government promissory notes at a discount, when they are selling in the market at a premium. A has obtained a valuable thing from Z without adequate consideration.

COMMENT.

The mere taking of presents by a public functionary, when it cannot be proved that such presents were corruptly taken, is made penal by this section. Under s. 161 the gratification is taken as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do an official act; under this section the question of motive or reward is not material as the section prohibits the taking of a thing without consideration from a person having any connection with the official functions of the public servant. There is no absolute prohibition, but the limit is drawn by the framers of the Code who say:

"Absolutely to prohibit all public functionaries from taking presents would be to prohibit a son from contributing to the support of a father, a father from giving a portion with a daughter, a brother from extricating a brother from pecuniary difficulties. No Government would wish to prevent person intimately connected by blood, by marriage or by friendship, from rendering services to each other; and no tribunals would enforce a law which should make the rendering of such services a crime. Where no such close connexion exists, the receiving of large presents by a public functionary is generally a very suspicious proceeding; but a lime, a wreath of flowers, a slice of betel-nut, a drop of atar of roses poured on his handkerchief, are presents which it would in this country be held churlish to refuse, and which cannot possibly corrupt the most mercenary of mankind. Other presents, of more value than these, may, on account of their peculiar nature, be accepted, without affording any ground for suspicion. Luxuries socially consumed, according to the usages of hospitality, are presents of this description; it would be unreasonable to treat a man in office as a criminal, for drinking many rupees-worth of champagne in a year, at the table of an acquaintance; though if he were to suffer one of his subordinates to accept even a single rupee in specie, he might deserve exemplary punishment."²⁴ If a public servant was allowed to take presents he might be induced to take a bribe in the shape of presents.

A police-officer, employed to bring up each case with the witnesses for trial, asked for and obtained one rupee from the prosecutor in a case after the prosecution had ended. It was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section, and not under s. 161. Stuart, C. J., observed: "The only question is whether the rupee here was a 'valuable thing' within the meaning of that section [s. 165]. The value must, I think, be looked at with reference to the proportion it bears to the money or property of which it forms part, and here the rupee was rather less than a third of the whole sum obtained by Chattra [complainant] from the Criminal Court."²⁵

This section does not prohibit a sale or purchase by a public servant, at a fair price, to or from a person transacting business before him.¹

If a person, being in any way connected with the official functions of a public servant, induces him to accept anything for an inadequate consideration, he abets the offence mentioned in this section.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused is a public servant.

(2) That he has accepted or obtained, or has agreed to accept, or has attempted to obtain, for himself or for some one else, a valuable thing.

(3) That he gave no consideration for it, or gave a consideration which he knew to be inadequate.

(4) That the person from whom the accused accepted, etc., the same, was known to the accused to have been, or then was, or was likely to be, concerned in a proceeding or business transacted or about to be transacted by himself, or which had a connection with the official functions of himself, or of a public servant to whom the accused was subordinate or from a person known to the accused to be interested in,

or related to, the person so concerned. As to the non-admissibility of the evidence of similar but unconnected instances of receiving illegal gratifications, see M. J. Vyapoory Moodeliar's case.²

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class.

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary before prosecution is launched.³

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, being a public servant in the——Department, accepted (or obtained, etc.) for yourself (or for——) a valuable thing, viz.——, without consideration (or for consideration which you knew to be inadequate) from——whom you knew to have been concerned in a proceeding (or business transacted by you), viz.——, [whom you knew to be interested in, or related to, the person so concerned] and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 165 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

166. Whoever, being a public servant, knowingly disobeys any direction of the law¹ as to the way in which he is to conduct himself as such public servant, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will, by such disobedience, cause injury² to any person,³ shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Public servant disobeying law, with intent to cause injury to any person.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, being an officer directed by law to take property in execution, in order to satisfy a decree pronounced in Z's favour by a Court of Justice, knowingly disobeys that direction of law, with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause injury to Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

COMMENT.

The offence made punishable by this section consists, not in an inadvertent or even careless, but in a wilful departure from the direction of the law intending to cause injury to any person. There must be a wilful disobedience of an express direction of the law, and a disobedience to an order is not sufficient, even though that order may be one that is given under a provision of law.⁴ A mere breach of departmental rules will not bring a public servant within the purview of this section. The Law Commissioners observe that this section is very comprehensive, and includes several offences respecting the abuse of official authority, and "regarding officers omitting to arrest offenders and suffering prisoners to escape, so far as the offence is voluntary, and in general only breach of official duty, by which it is intended, or which is known to be likely to injure any party, or to save any person from legal punishment."⁵

1. 'Direction of the law.'—It may be a direction given by a written law or a mandate proceeding from a competent authority which the public servant is bound by law to obey—as a writ or order for the liberation of a person from prison.⁶ If the direction of law given by a special Act is violated, the punishment will be under that Act. Thus, a postal official absenting himself from his station without leave will be charged under the Post Office Act and not under this section.⁷ Where a peon whose duty it was to require the signature of a person on whom a notice was served represented the notice to be a warrant and arrested him, it was held that he had disobeyed a direction of law and that he was guilty under this section.⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was a public servant.

(2) That he conducted himself in the particular manner charged.

(3) That such conduct was in the exercise of his public duties as such servant.

(4) That such conduct was in disobedience to a direction of law.

(5) That when the accused disobeyed such direction of law, he did so knowingly.

(6) That when the accused was guilty of such disobedience, he thereby intended or knew that he was likely thereby to cause an injury.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class.

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary before prosecution is launched.⁹

Charge.—The charge should be stated as nearly as possible in the language of the section of the Act which is disobeyed.¹⁰ The particular direction of the law should be specified.¹¹ The charge should run thus :—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, did (or omitted to do, as the case may be), such conduct being contrary to the provisions of Act——, section——, and known by you to be prejudicial to——, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 166 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.¹² to be incorrect, intending thereby to cause³ or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury⁴ to any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

The preceding section dealt generally with the disobedience of any direction of law; this section deals with a specific instance, viz., that of framing an incorrect document with intent to cause injury. This section is similar to s. 218.

The gist of the offence consists in an intention to cause injury to any person by a perversion of official duty.

1. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra.

2. 'Charged with the preparation or translation of any document.'—

The word 'charged' is not to be narrowly construed. Where an officer is expressly appointed to prepare a document he is a public servant charged with the preparation of that document. There is no difference between the preparation and the framing of an electoral roll. According to the dictionaries "to prepare" is to make ready or make by a regular process, and "to frame", to construct by combination of parts or adaptation to design. A person who prepares a document in the ordinary meaning of the former word could be said to have framed it.¹³ A head-clerk of a Municipality appointed to prepare the electoral rolls, prepared them incorrectly and went away on leave before signing or delivering them, and they were, therefore, signed and delivered by his locum tenens. It was held that for this section to apply the preparing and framing must be complete and final so far as the author is concerned, and it was difficult to exclude anything that it would have been permissible for the head-clerk to do to the rolls until the time came for his signing them and delivering them. He could not therefore be convicted under this section.¹⁴

"Making what purports to be a copy of a document is not included in the words 'preparation or translation of any document', nor in the words 'frames or translates that document'".¹⁵

As to the meaning of "document", see s. 29, supra.

3. 'Intending thereby to cause.'—"Where an act in itself indifferent, if done with a particular intent becomes criminal, there the intent must be proved and found; but where the act is in itself unlawful, ... the proof of justification or excuse lies on the defendant; and in failure thereof, the law implies criminal intent."¹⁶ If the act is done without intending to cause injury to anybody it would not amount to an offence under this section.¹⁷

4. 'Injury.'—See s. 44, supra.

Submitting false report.—Where an amin, who was entrusted with the execution of a warrant for the attachment of movable property, submitted a report to the Court with a certificate, falsely stating in them that certain persons forcibly rescued the attached property, while it was in fact released by an amicable arrangement with the consent of the judgment-creditor, it was held that he was a public servant charged with the preparation of a document within the meaning of this section and was liable to be punished under it.¹⁸ It was held similarly where a process server who was conducting a sale of attached moveables made a false report relating to the sale.¹⁹

Making false entry.—A Station House Officer, in order to support an Inspector, made a false entry in his diary that "four cartmen stated to him as they had said before the Inspector." It appeared from the evidence that he took no action on the complaint of the cartmen, and his statement that no complaint of dacoity was made to him was falsified by his own witnesses. It was held that he was guilty of intentionally framing an incorrect public record.²⁰

Incorrect copy.—The accused, a village patwari, prepared an incorrect copy of an entry in his roznamah for a plaintiff in a civil suit. The entry related to a contract between the plaintiff and another. It was held that the accused had committed an offence under this section of framing an incorrect document.²¹ Accused, a copyist in a Court, framed an incorrect copy of a document filed with a certain record, by adding a name not contained in the original. The incorrect copy was delivered duly certified to the person who had applied for it, and who was probably in collusion with the copyist. This copy was afterwards made use of in a suit against the person whose name had been fraudulently added, and then the fraud was detected. It was held that this section was not applicable as it was not shown that the accused intended or knew it to be likely that he would cause injury to any person, but the accused was guilty under s. 197.²²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was a public servant.

(2) That he had the charge of the preparation or the translation of the document.

(3) That he had such charge, in his capacity of a public servant.

(4) That he framed, or translated it in an incorrect manner.

(6) That he did as above, with intent, or with knowledge that it was likely that he would thereby cause injury.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Separate convictions.—The offence of a public servant framing an incorrect document with intent to cause injury under this section is included in the offence of forging a document and using it as genuine under ss. 467 and 471 of the Code and a conviction both under the provisions of this section and ss. 467 and 471 is not maintainable.²³

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary before prosecution is launched.²⁴

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, being a public servant, to wit—, and being, as such public servant, charged with the preparation (or translation) of the document relating to—, framed (or translated) that document in a manner which you knew (or believed) to be incorrect, intending thereby to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you might thereby cause) injury to—and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 167 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

Punishment.—An official, however humble, who deliberately tampers with official records and issues false copies, whatever his motives may be, deserves severe punishment, not merely for his own conduct but as a deterrent to others who may be tempted to follow his example.²⁵

168. Whoever, being a public servant,¹ and being legally bound to as such public servant not to engage in trade, engages Public servant unlawfully engag- in trade,³ shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section punishes those public servants only who are legally bound not to engage in trade. It is in a way incomplete without the assistance of some other enactment, or rule of law which imposes the legal prohibition required.

Public servants are not allowed to trade in order that they may not neglect their duties. Being in official position they could easily obtain unfair advantages over other traders.

1. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra.

2. 'Legally bound.'—See s. 48, supra. Only those public servants who are prohibited under any Act from trading come within the purview of this section. For any breach of a departmental rule they cannot be punished under the Code.

3. 'Engages in trade.'—The Indian Penal Code contains no definition of the very general word 'trade', and no explanation of the equally wide term 'engages in trade.' This section has been made the radix for a number of special enactments going to control the conduct of public servants in the matter of varied descriptions of traffic and money dealings. The section is in a way incomplete without the assistance of some other enactment or rule of law which imposes the legal prohibition required; and the enactment containing the prohibition naturally and necessarily defines the area which is covered by it, both as to the class of public servants to whom it applies, and the nature of the dealings in which those servants are prevented from engaging. In the majority of cases, the municipal law, so to speak, hands over to the Indian Penal Code an offender who engages in any commercial dealing prohibited by it. But there are cases where the penalty for such an offence is provided by the special Act itself.¹

Several statutes have been passed from time to time prohibiting public officers from engaging in trade. Such statutes either provide the penalty to be inflicted for their breach or refer to this section of the Code.

A person engages in trade who habitually buys and sells with a view to profit. The word 'trade' does not include lending money at interest. Lending money at interest does not amount to 'unlawfully engaging in trade.' Where a public servant lent money to others for buying wheat but had taken no part in its speculation nor had set up a shop for its sale or purchase, it was held that he was not liable under this section.² But where a police constable carried on a shop contrary to the prohibition contained in s. 10 of the Police Act, he was held guilty under this section.³

A Vice-Chairman of a Municipal Board was vested with authority to make contracts for the construction of municipal works, and to pass the contractor's bills and issue cheques for the payment of the same out of municipal funds. In pursuance of this authority, the Vice-Chairman gave two contracts for the construction of municipal drains to L, a regular contractor with the Board. L being without funds for the execution of the contracts, the Vice-Chairman, who had a private money-lending business, advanced money to L for that purpose, and subsequently passed L's bills and repaid himself from the realization of municipal cheques issued by him. It was held that the Vice-Chairman was guilty of an offence under this section.⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was a public servant.

(2) That he, as such, was legally bound not to engage in trade.

(3) That he had engaged in trade.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

The Court can take cognizance of this offence without the previous sanction of the Provincial Government.⁵

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary before prosecution is launched.⁶

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the ——— day of ———, at ———, being a public servant, to wit ———, and being, as such public servant, legally bound not to engage in trade, did engage in trade, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 168 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

169. Whoever, being a public servant,¹ and being legally bound² as such public servant, not to purchase or bid for certain property, purchases or bids for that property, either in his own name or in the name of another, or jointly, or in shares with others, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both; and the property, if purchased, shall be confiscated.

COMMENT.

This section is merely an extension of the principle enunciated in the last section. It prohibits a public servant from purchasing or bidding for property which he is legally bound not to purchase.

2. 'Legally bound.'—Sec s. 43, supra. The public servant must be legally bound not to bid for property. Thus, where a Sub-Inspector was charged with having purchased a pony, which had been impounded, it was held that he should have been convicted under this section and s. 19 of the Cattle Trespass Act (I of 1871) and that he could not be convicted under s. 406 of criminal breach of trust.⁷ Where a member of a District Board was convicted for having purchased, in the name of another, a buffalo belonging to the Board at an auction sale held by the Board, it was held that he was not guilty under this section as the purchase of the buffalo would not be "acquiring an interest in any contract with or by the Board" within the meaning of s. 34 of the District Boards Act, 1922.⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was a public servant.

(2) That he, as such, was legally bound not to purchase or bid for the property in question.

(3) That he did purchase or bid for that property, either in his own name, or in the name of another, or jointly, or in shares with others.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

That you, being a public servant in the—Department and being legally bound as such public servant not to purchase (or bid for) certain property, viz.—, purchased (or bid for that property) in your name [or in the name of—] or jointly or in shares with—] and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 169 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

170. Whoever pretends to hold any particular office as a public servant, knowing that he does not hold such office¹ or Personating a public servant. ^a falsely personates any other person holding such office,² and in such assumed character does or attempts to do any act under colour of such office,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section punishes a person who pretends to hold any public office as a public servant or falsely personates any other person holding such office, and does any act in the assumed character of a public servant.

Scope.—"Section 170... does not make the act of pretending to hold a particular office as a public servant punishable, unless the person in such assumed character does, or attempts to do, any act under colour of such office."¹⁰

Ingredients.—The section requires two things :—

1. A person (a) pretending to hold a particular office as a public servant, knowing that he does not hold such office, or (b) falsely personating any other person holding such office.

2. Such person in such assumed character must do or attempt to do an act under colour of such office.

1. 'Pretends to hold any particular office as a public servant, knowing that he does not hold such office.'—The particular office must be an existing office. If it is uncertain who legally fills the office, a person doing an official act in pursuance of what he honestly believes to be his lawful title to the office, does not come within the section.

As to the meaning of 'public servant', see s. 21, supra.

2. 'Falsely personates any other person holding such office.'—'Falsely' does not mean 'fraudulently.' A fraudulent or dishonest intention is immaterial.¹¹ "To 'personate' means to pretend to be a particular person."¹²

3. 'In such assumed character does or attempts to do any act under colour of such office.'—It is not necessary that the act done or attempted to be done should be such an act as might legally be done by the public servant personated.¹³ The accused was arrested when he was demanding one anna's worth of fruit from a fruit-seller for one pice on the representation that he was a head constable, which in fact he was not. It was held that if he pretended to be a police-officer and as such police-officer tried to extort money or things from a fruit-seller, he committed an offence under this section, and it was not necessary that the act done under colour of office should be a legal act on the part of the accused.¹⁴ Where the accused, a constable in the Criminal Investigation Department, pretended to be a police-officer and as such police-officer demanded the production of certain papers from people who had cattle with them, it was held that he was guilty under this section.¹⁵ Where a person posed as a Government servant and by so doing obtained services which he otherwise would not have obtained and which the other person was bound to give on demand by a Government officer, it was held that he was guilty under this section.¹⁶

'Under colour of such office'.—An act is done 'under colour' of an office, if it is an act having some relation to the office, which the actor pretends to hold. If it has no relation to the office, as, if A pretending to be a servant of Government, travelling through a district, obtain money, provisions, etc., the offence may amount to cheating under s. 415, but is not punishable under this section.¹⁷ The phrase 'an act under colour of such office' points to acts which could not have been done without assuming official authority or responsibility, and would not connote acts of a ministerial or mechanical character, which might be done without requiring the justification of office in the person doing them.¹⁸ A mere promise to appoint a person as a constable cannot be regarded as an act under colour of the office of a C.I.D. Officer. Nor can the writing on the paper of something unintelligible and non-sense be regarded as an act done under colour of the office of a C.I.D. Officer.¹⁹ Where one kulkarni performed certain ministerial official duties in connection with a record on behalf of another, the offence under this section was not committed.²⁰ Where a Village Revenue Officer, in the absence of the Village Magistrate, exercised the powers of a Village Magistrate, and it was found that he acted in good faith, it was held that a conviction under this section could not be sustained.²¹ The mere assumption of a false character without any attempt to do an official act is not sufficient. Where the accused went to the platform of a railway station and obtained admission on a pretence that he was a C.I.D. Officer without purchasing a platform ticket, it was held that his conviction under this section was wrong, because the act of the accused did not assume an official authority.²² But the act of the accused did constitute the offence of cheating. Where a person, pretending to be a police-officer, reprimanded some villagers on account of the state of the roads in the vicinity, and obtained some money from them, a conviction under this section was upheld on the ground that the act committed by the accused had some relation to the office he pretended to hold, as the police are often deputed on such matters.²³

PRACTICE.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, pretended to hold the office of—, as a public servant (or falsely personated—holding such office), and in such assumed character did (or attempted to do)—under colour of such office and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 170 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

vants, wears any garb or carries any token resembling any garb or token used by that class of public servants, with the intention that it may be believed,¹ or with the knowledge that it is likely to be believed, that he belongs to that class of public servants, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

Under s. 140 the wearing of the garb or carrying of the token of a soldier is made punishable. This section punishes the wearing of a garb or carrying of a token used by a public servant with the intention to pass off as such public servant. The offence is complete, although no act is either done or attempted to be done in the assumed official-character. The mere circumstance of wearing the garb, or using the token, with the intention or knowledge supposed is sufficient. If any act is done then the preceding section will apply. The English law is to the same effect. If a person at Oxford, who is not a member of the University, go to a shop for the purpose of fraud, wearing a commoner's cap and gown, and obtain goods, this appearing in a cap and gown is a sufficient false pretence though nothing passes in words.²⁴

1. 'With the intention that it may be believed, etc.'—Intention is the gist of the offence under this section. The intention must be to practise deception by wearing the garb or carrying the token of a public servant. Where the accused was found carrying a police jacket under his arm, with intent that it should be believed that he was a police constable, it was held that he committed no offence under this section as he was not wearing the jacket.²⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused wore the garb, or carried the token in question.

(2) That such garb or token resembled that of a public servant.

(3) That the accused did not belong to the class of public servants, who use such garb or token.

(4) That he did as in (1) with the intention, or with the knowledge, that it was likely that it might be believed he was such public servant.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

Sentence.—Where an accused person is convicted of wearing the garb of a police constable, and of personating by means of such garb a police constable, and, as such, ordering a person to be kept in custody, only one sentence ought to be passed on him under the provisions of s. 71 of the Code.¹

CHAPTER IXA.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO ELECTIONS.

THIS Chapter has been introduced in the Code by the Indian Elections Offences and Inquiries Act (XXXIX of 1920) to give effect to the recommendations of the Joint Select Committee appointed to report on the Government of India Act. In their Report they observed: "The Committee are themselves firmly convinced that a complete and stringent Corrupt Practices Act should be brought into operation before the first election for the Legislative Councils. There is no such Act at present in existence in India, and the Committee are convinced that it will not be less required in India than it is in other countries". Act XXXIX of 1920 was, therefore, enacted to provide for the punishment of malpractices in connection with elections, and to make further provision for the conduct of inquiries in regard to disputed elections to legislative bodies constituted under the Government of India Act.

The Government of India thought it desirable that advantage should be taken of this opportunity to make election offences part of the general law of the land, not only in respect of Legislative bodies, but also in the case of election to public bodies generally.

The Select Committee to which the Indian Elections Offences and Inquiries Bill was referred, in their Report, observed: "We feel there are distinct advantages at the present time when election is to play so important a part in the new public life of India that the public conscience should be markedly drawn to the danger of corrupt practices in relation to the franchise, whether that franchise relates to legislative or other bodies. We feel it is of the greatest importance that the principle of the purity of the franchise should be insisted on in the general criminal law of the country and that it should not be left to local legislatures to deal with the broad principles enacted in Part I of the Bill. There will be sufficient scope for those bodies in elaborating and supplementing the law as proposed in the Bill for we recognize that it is by no means exhaustive. Experience may no doubt show that minor offences will require to be provided against and that local conditions may need local treatment. We feel, however, that to lay down the broad basis of a law so necessary to protect the purity of the franchise is an appropriate piece of work for the Imperial Legislative Council".¹

The present chapter, therefore, "seeks to make punishable under the ordinary penal law, bribery, undue influence and personation and certain other malpractices at elections not only to the legislative bodies, but also to membership of public authorities where the law prescribes a method of election; and, further, to debar persons guilty of such malpractices from holding positions of public responsibility for a specific period".²

The new offences that are thus inserted in the Penal Code are bribery, undue influence, personation and deliberate false statements with the object of prejudicing a candidate at or in connection with elections.³

171A. For the purposes of this Chapter—

(a) "candidate" means a person who has been nominated as a candidate at any election¹ and includes a person who, when an election is in contemplation, holds himself out as a prospective candidate thereat; provided that he is subsequently nominated as a candidate at such election ;

(b) “electoral right” means the right of a person to stand, or not to stand as, or to withdraw from being, a candidate or to vote or refrain from voting at an election.¹

COMMENT.

The definition of ‘candidate’ is taken from the English Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 77, and Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, 47 & 48 Vic., c. 70, s. 34. A person becomes a candidate as soon as he declares himself⁵ a candidate or is nominated as a candidate. Such declaration may be in the form of an election manifesto or address.

1. ‘Election’.—‘Election’ is defined as including election to all classes of public bodies where such a system is prescribed by law (vide Explanation 3 to s. 21, supra).

171B. (1) Whoever—

(i) gives a gratification to any person with the object of inducing him or any other person to exercise any electoral right or of rewarding any person for having exercised any such right ; or

(ii) accepts either for himself or for any other person any gratification as a reward for exercising any such right or for inducing or attempting to induce any other person to exercise any such right, commits the offence of bribery :

Provided that a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action shall not be an offence under this section.

(2) A person who offers, or agrees to give, or offers, or attempts to procure, a gratification shall be deemed to give a gratification.

(3) A person who obtains or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain a gratification shall be deemed to accept a gratification, and a person who accepts a gratification as a motive for doing what he does not intend to do, or as a reward for doing what he has not done, shall be deemed to have accepted the gratification as a reward.

COMMENT.

This section defines the offence of bribery at an election. It abridges the definition given in the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (17 & 18 Vic., c. 102).

‘Bribery’ is defined primarily as the giving or acceptance of a gratification either as a motive or as a reward to any person, either to induce him to stand as, or not to stand as, or to withdraw from being, a candidate, or to vote or refrain from voting at an election. It also includes offers or agreements to give or offer and attempts to procure a gratification for any person. Gratification is already explained in s. 161 and is not restricted to pecuniary gratifications or to gratifications estimable in money.⁶

Sub-sec. (2).—‘Offers’.—By this clause the attempt to corrupt is made equivalent to the complete act.

⁶ See the Statement of Objects and Reasons, G I., 1920, Part V, p. 185, s. 8.

Treating.—Treating will be bribery if refreshment is given or accepted with the intent required by the law.⁷ Treating of non-electors in order that they might influence voters⁸ or of women in order that they might influence their fathers or brothers would be illegal.⁹ See Explan. to s. 171 E as to the meaning of 'treating'.

The gist of the offence of treating is the corrupt inducement to the voter to vote or refrain from voting, which may be given at any time, although for obvious reasons it is usually given at or shortly before the election. Thus it has been held that the seat may be avoided for acts of treating done in July, though the dissolution did not take place till August.¹⁰

CASES.

Bribery.—Paying a voter's debts;¹¹ permitting a voter to shoot rabbits on the estate of the candidate;¹² paying travelling expenses of a voter on condition that he must vote for the payer;¹³ paying rates and taxes of a voter;¹⁴ payment made to keep away voters from voting;¹⁵ payment to a voter for loss of time;¹⁶ offering money to a rival candidate for withdrawing his candidature.¹⁷

Not bribery.—Payment to election agents;¹⁸ payment of election expenses to a candidate.¹⁹

Treating.—Where the respondent stood drinks to all the members of a political club who were present three years before the election, this was held to be not treating, partly on account of the length of time between it and the election.²⁰

Where the sitting member, after the election, treated a number of people (who met him on his leaving the borough to congratulate him) with whisky, but it was shown that he did not know whether they were voters or not, and in fact only two of them were, the election was not avoided.²¹

Where refreshment was strictly confined to those who were actually engaged in the work of the election, and were known supporters of the sitting member, his committee men in fact, the election was upheld.²²

Where refreshment was provided on the polling day by the sitting member's agent, but no one, as it appeared, partook of it, except those who had come with the express object of voting for him, nor was there any previous announcement that such refreshment would be provided nor anything said to voters, at the time they got the refreshment, the election was not avoided.²³

Where the respondent gave an entertainment in the month of October, 1905, which all persons in the borough were invited to attend by an advertisement in a local paper, and printed handbills inviting all the friends of the candidate to attend and meet the retiring member, and stating that there would be a band and tea, coffee, and refreshments, and two dozen bottles of whisky were provided after the 'At Home' began with the candidate's consent, the election taking place in the following January, it was held that there was no corrupt intention, and therefore the respondent was not guilty of treating.²⁴

Where, however, a garden party was given in September, 1905, at the country seat of the respondent's father, nominally by a political social council, at which refreshments were provided on a lavish scale, and political speeches were made, this was held to be treating by an agent, the election taking place in January, 1906.²⁵

²⁵ Bodmin Election Petition, (1906) The Times, June 12th.

Where a philanthropic society was started, of which the respondent was president, and in time of distress a large number of tickets, many of which bore the respondent's name, were given away, which entitled the possessors to food or coals, and the respondent alluded to such distribution in his speeches, this was held not to be bribery or cheating, but the Judges expressed an opinion that it might be, if the giving of the tickets were coupled with a request for the individual's vote, or if the tickets were given dishonestly and colourably on a large scale, although there were no selection of voters only, and even if a large proportion of the recipients were non-voters, and that in the latter case it would probably amount to bribery or treating at common law.¹

A conversazione, though given in the name of a political association, was to be paid for by the respondent, and refreshments were to be obtained by producing a ticket which cost three pence. It was proved that the refreshments could not have been supplied for the amount which was charged. The Court held that the refreshments were supplied in an excessive quantity to influence voters in favour of the respondent and avoided the election for treating by agents, but acquitted the respondent of personal treating.²

The giving of drink to those present at meetings of political associations, even before the electoral campaign has begun, is most dangerous.³

Smoking concerts are objectionable, as affording an opportunity of treating.⁴

171C. (1) Whoever voluntarily interferes or attempts to interfere with the free exercise of any electoral right commits the offence of undue influence at an election.

at elections.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of sub-section (1), whoever--

(a) threatens any candidate or voter, or any person in whom a candidate or voter is interested, with injury¹ of any kind, or

(b) induces or attempts to induce a candidate or voter to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested will become or will be rendered an object of Divine displeasure or of spiritual censure, shall be deemed to interfere with the free exercise of the electoral right of such candidate or voter, within the meaning of sub-section (1).

(3) A declaration of public policy or a promise of public action, or the mere exercise of a legal right without intent to interfere with an electoral right, shall not be deemed to be interference within the meaning of this section.

COMMENT.

This section defines 'undue influence at elections'. The offence is punishable under s. 171F.

"Undue influence at an election is defined as the voluntary interference or attempted interference with the right of any person to stand, or not to stand as, or withdraw from being, a candidate, or to vote or refrain from voting. This covers all threats of injury to person or property and all illegal methods of persuasion and any interference with the liberty of the candidates or the electors. A sub-section is added to explain that the inducing or attempting to induce a person to believe that he will become the object of Divine displeasure is also interference. It is not, however, interference within the meaning of the clause to make a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action".⁵

"The second sub-clause is merely explanatory of the general definitions in the first sub-clause and does not restrict the generality of the words used there. We have considered the criticisms of this clause based on the generality of the words employed but we are satisfied that any attempt at specific enumeration would be open to a serious danger of loopholes in what we regard as a most salutary provision".⁶

Where an attempt or threat is proved, it is unnecessary to prove that any person was in fact prevented from voting because the offence is complete.

1. 'Injury'.—See s. 44, supra.

CASES.

On the night preceding the day of an election the complainant, a candidate, was prevented from coming out of his house to canvass for votes, by his rival candidate, the accused, and others who were picketing the complainant's house. It was held that the accused had not interfered or attempted to interfere with the free exercise of an electoral right or threatened any candidate or voter with injury, and no prima facie case under this section was made out.⁷

English cases.—Where it was proved that an agent for the sitting member, who was a large employer of labour, first extracted a promise from his men not to vote at all, and subsequently threatened that if they voted for L, they should have no further employment from him, the election was avoided, although some of the men so threatened left of their own accord previously to the election.⁸

One H, one of the respondent's principal agents, and chairman of one of the district committees at the election, who was a Justice of the Peace, and a trustee of several charities, and a very influential person in the borough, stood with his gardener, J. M., just outside one of the polling stations, and spoke to many of the voters as they came to the poll, and solicited one voter, who was wearing the petitioner's colours, to vote for the respondent. When another voter wearing the petitioner's colours was coming out of the polling station, J. M. called out, "We shall know him and remember him another day". It was held that though this conduct was highly improper, yet it did not amount by itself to undue influence so as to avoid the election.⁹

Where undue influence by the improper exercise of spiritual influence was proved to have been committed by agents of the respondents, the elections were avoided. In this case it appeared that a pastoral had been issued by the Catholic bishop to the clergy throughout certain constituencies, and was read by them from the altar a few days before the election. The pastoral denounced the political party to which the petitioners belonged, condemned their principles as unlawful and unholy, and threatened with spiritual injury and loss all persons who should vote for them.¹⁰

171D. Whoever at an election applies for a voting paper or votes in the name of any other person, whether living or dead, or in a fictitious name, or who having voted once at such election applies at the same election for a voting paper¹ in his own name, and whoever abets, procures or attempts to procure the voting by any person in any such way,² commits the offence of personation at an election.

Personation at elections.

COMMENT.

This section defines 'personation at elections'. The offence is punishable under s. 171F.

The definition of 'personation' closely follows the definition in s. 24 of the Ballot

Act, 1872, and covers both a person who attempts to vote in another person's name, or in a fictitious name, a voter who attempts to vote twice, and any person who abets, procures or attempts to procure such voting.¹¹

Corrupt motive essential.—To constitute the offence of personation under this section it is necessary to prove that the accused in doing the act with which he is charged was actuated by a corrupt motive.¹²

1. 'Having voted once... applies at the same election for a voting paper'.—The offence of double voting can be charged not only under this section but also under s. 55 (1) of the Madras District Municipalities Act (Mad. Act V of 1920).¹³ It will be punishable also under similar provisions of the District Municipal Acts of other provinces.

2. 'Whoever abets... the voting by any person in any such way'.—These words mean the abetment of the voting at an election in the name of another person living at that date, or in a fictitious name, or a second time.¹⁴ If at an election a man applies to the presiding officer for a ballot paper in a name other than his name of origin, or in the name by which he is generally known, but in a name which appears on the register of voters, and which was inserted therein by the overseers in the belief that it was the name of the applicant, and for the purpose of putting him on the register, he is entitled to vote, and if he does so he is not guilty of personation.¹⁵

Personation.—The usual method of voting at an election was for the voter to obtain a paper called the signature slip and thereupon to go to the election officer and obtain a voting paper. An applicant went to an election officer in charge of signature slips and produced a certain piece of paper bearing a certain number. The name L appeared in the electoral roll against that number and the applicant professed to be L. A patwari pointed out that the applicant was not L but was one M. After some dispute the applicant admitted that he was not L. It was held that the applicant was not guilty of an attempt to commit the offence of fraudulently applying for a voting paper and thereby personating at an election.¹⁶ The Court observed: "In this case the obtaining of the 'signature slip' was an act which by itself would not have amounted to an application for a voting paper. The applicant was frustrated in the act of obtaining a signature slip. If he had not been frustrated, all that he would have committed was the obtaining of a signature slip on false pretences. The completion of this act would not have amounted to a completion of the act of applying for a voting paper."¹⁷

The applicant was accused of having abetted the personation of a voter at a municipal election in that, not being himself acquainted with the person who came forward to vote, he had, on the advice of others, put his name to a "signature sheet" in token that the thumb-mark made by the voter was that of the person entitled to vote under a certain name on the electoral roll. It was held that, inasmuch as the acts done by the applicant constituted the specific offence provided for by this section, he could only be tried for the offence, and could not be tried for abetment of the general offence provided for by s. 465 of the Code.¹⁸

Where the accused, a candidate at a Municipal election, was not aware of the fact that a certain voter was falsely personating one HS and the accused did not profess to attest on his personal knowledge the voting paper of the voter, and where the polling officer also was aware of the fact that the accused was not attesting on personal knowledge, it was held that the accused was not guilty of intentionally aiding the commission of an offence under this section.¹⁹

In the electoral roll of a Municipality one MD son of FM was recorded as a person entitled to vote. The accused MD whose father's name was A asked for a ballot paper in the name of MD son of FM and when questioned he asserted that his father's name was FM. There was no evidence on the record that the officer who prepared the electoral roll intended to put the accused on the register and that MD son of FM had no existence at all. It was held that the accused was guilty of the offence of personation.²⁰

Where it is not shown that the accused knew he was not entitled to vote in that there was upon the list the name of another person which name was the same as his own, no offence is committed.²¹ 171E. Whoever commits the offence of bribery shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both :

Punishment for bribery.

Provided that bribery by treating shall be punished with fine only.

Explanation.—‘Treating’ means that form of bribery where the gratification consists in food, drink, entertainment, or provision.

COMMENT.

This section prescribes the punishment which should be inflicted for the offence of bribery and treating. Bribery by treating is punishable with fine only.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove, where the accused is the giver of the bribe,

- (1) that he gave gratification to a particular person ;
- (2) that he did so with the object of (a) inducing him or any other person to exercise any electoral right, or (b) of rewarding any person for having exercised any such right.

Prove, where the accused is the acceptor of the bribe,

- (1) that he accepted either for himself or for any other person a gratification ;
- (2) that he did so as a reward (a) for exercising any electoral right, or (b) for inducing or attempting to induce any other person to exercise any such right.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons —Bailable—Not compoundable— Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Sanction.—Previous sanction is necessary for prosecution under this section.²²

(Where accused is the giver of the bribe.)

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, gave a gratification, to wit——, to——with the object of [inducing him or——to exercise his electoral right] [or rewarding——for having exercised his electoral right] and thereby committed an offence under s. 171E of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

(Where accused is the acceptor of the bribe.)

That you accepted for yourself or for——a gratification, to wit——, as a reward [for exercising your or his electoral right] or [for inducing or attempting to induce——to exercise his electoral right].

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

COMMENT.

* This section specifies the punishment for undue influence at an election (s. 171C) or personation at an election (s. 171D.).

Where a voter who was not present at a polling station was personated by his brother and the candidate in whose favour he voted attested the identity slip vouchsafing that the person who had appeared at the polling station was the voter himself, it was held that there was deliberate offence of abetment of false personation.²³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused voluntarily interfered or attempted to interfere with the free exercise of any electoral right; or

(3) that the accused induced or attempted to induce a candidate or voter to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested will become or will be rendered an object of Divine displeasure or of spiritual censure.

In the case of personation at an election prove (1) that the accused at an election applied for a voting paper or voted in the name of any other person, whether living or dead, or in a fictitious name; or

(2) that the accused having voted once at an election applied at the same election for a voting paper in his own name; or

(3) that the accused abetted, procured, or attempted to procure, the voting by any person in any one of the above ways.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

In the Bombay Presidency, in the Punjab, in the Central Provinces, in the North-West Frontier Province and in Burma if the offence is of personation at an election, then it is cognizable.²⁴

The accused abetted the personation of a voter at a Municipal election in that not being himself acquainted with the person who came forward to vote, he had, on the advice of others, put his name to a "signature sheet" in token that the thumb-mark made by the voter was that of the person entitled to vote under a certain name on the electoral roll. It was held that, inasmuch as the acts done by the applicant apparently constituted the specific offence provided for by this section, he could only be tried for that offence, and could not be tried for abetment of the general offence provided for by s. 465.²⁵

Sanction.—Previous sanction is necessary for prosecution under this section.¹ If the act of the accused is punishable under this section sanction of the local Government is necessary. For want of sanction he cannot be tried under s. 465.²

Sentence.—An offence of personation at elections is a most serious one and deserves a severe sentence.³

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, voluntarily interfered (or attempted to interfere) with the free exercise of an electoral right, to wit——[or threatened——, a candidate (or voter or person in whom a candidate (or voter) to wit——is interested] with injury, to wit——] or [induced (or attempted to induce——) a candidate (or voter) at an election, to wit——, to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested, to wit—— will become an object of Divine displeasure (or of spiritual censure)] and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 171F of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

The charge for the offence of personation at an election should run thus:—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at the election, to wit—, applied for a voting paper (or voted) [in the name of another person, to wit—, who is living (or dead)] [or in a fictitious name, to wit—] [or in your name after having voted once at the said election] and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 171F of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

Where the offence falls within the second paragraph of s. 171D the following should be substituted in place of the second paragraph in the above charge:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at the election, to wit—, abetted (or procured or attempted to procure) the voting by——(specify the act committed and which is punishable under the first para. of s. 171D) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 171F of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

makes or publishes any statement purporting to be a statement of fact which is false and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, in relation to the personal character or conduct of any candidate shall be punished with fine.

COMMENT.

False statements of fact in relation to the personal character or conduct of a candidate are penalized by this section which corresponds to s. 1 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vic., c. 40). The offence under this section is not a species of the more general offence of defamation and the section cannot be said to have been carved out of s. 499 of the Code. There may be cases under this section which do not fall under s. 499 and vice versa. It cannot therefore be insisted that the complainant should proceed against the accused in respect of the offence under this section and not under s. 499.⁴

To prosecute a person under this section something false must have been stated by him as a fact and not as a general imputation or as a matter of opinion, in relation to the personal character or conduct of the candidate with intent to affect the result of the election.⁵ The section does not apply to defamatory statements about persons who are not candidates at an election.⁶

It is not a statement of fact relating to the personal character or conduct of a candidate to impute that he was saying that if he were to be elected he would take no part in any proceedings except to nod his head and hold up his hand.⁷ The complainant and the accused contested certain municipal elections and the accused tried to persuade the complainant to withdraw, but the complainant did not withdraw. Then the accused published a statement that the complainant was a leper in the municipal meeting hall at the time of receipt of nomination papers. It was held that the facts alleged did not constitute an offence under this section.⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused made or published any statement in relation to the personal character or conduct of a candidate.

(2) That such statement was false and the accused either knew or believed it to be false or did not believe it to be true.

(3) That the accused made or published such statement with intent to affect the result of an election.

Sanction.—Previous sanction is necessary for prosecution under this section.⁹

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, with intent to affect the result of the election, to wit—, made (or published) a statement in relation to the personal character (or conduct) of a candidate, to wit—, which statement is false and which you knew (or believed) to be false (or which you did not believe to be true) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 171G of the Indian Penal Code.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

171H. Whoever without the general or special authority in writing of a candidate incurs or authorizes expenses on account of the holding of any public meeting, or upon any advertisement, circular or publication, or in any other way whatsoever for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of such candidate, shall be punished with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees:

an election.

Provided that if any person having incurred any such expenses not exceeding the amount of ten rupees without authority obtains within ten days from the date on which such expenses were incurred the approval in writing of the candidate, he shall be deemed to have incurred such expenses with the authority of the candidate.

COMMENT.

This section makes it illegal for any one, unless authorized by a candidate, to incur any expenses in connection with the promotion of the candidate's election.

Under the proviso expenses may be incurred without the authority of a candidate up to an amount of ten rupees subject to ratification by the candidate of the action taken within ten days of the date on which the expenses are incurred.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused incurred or authorized expenses on account of the holding of any public meeting, or upon any advertisement, circular, or publication, or in any other way.

(2) That he did so for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of a candidate.

(3) That he incurred or authorized the said expenses without the general or special authority in writing of the candidate.

COMMENT.

This section punishes failure to keep accounts of expenses incurred at or in connection with an election, if such accounts are required to be kept by any law or rule having the force of law.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was required by any law for the time being in force or any rule having the force of law to keep accounts of expenses incurred at or in connection with an election.

CHAPTER X.

OF CONTEMPTS OF THE LAWFUL AUTHORITY OF PUBLIC SERVANTS.

THIS Chapter contains those penal provisions which are intended to enforce obedience to the lawful authority of public servants. Contempts of the lawful authority of Courts of Justice, of officers of Revenue, of officers of police, and of other public servants are punishable under this head. The penalties prescribed in this Chapter for particular offences obstructive of judicial proceedings must not be taken to interfere with other powers possessed by Courts of Justice and public functionaries to enforce their orders. They will not affect other coercive powers of the Courts of Justice to compel performance of their orders and decrees, whether by attachment and sale of property, by imprisonment or otherwise.¹

172. Whoever absconds in order to avoid being served with a summons, notice or order¹ proceeding from any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to issue such summons, notice or order,² shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both ;

or, if the summons or notice or order is to attend in person or by agent, or to produce a document in a Court of Justice,³ with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

Object.—The object of this section is to punish an offender for the contempt his conduct indicates of the authority whose process he disregards. The absconding must be with the intention of evading service.

Scope.—This section punishes the evasion of those orders which become binding from the moment they are served. It does not apply to orders which become binding without any kind of special service.

The second clause applies where the summons, notice or order is (1) for attendance in Court ; or (2) for production of a document.

Ingredients.—The section requires two things :—

1. Absconding in order to avoid being served with a summons, notice or order.
2. Such summons, notice or order must proceed from a public servant legally competent to issue it.

1. 'Absconds in order to avoid being served with a summons, notice or order'.—The "term 'abscond' is not to be understood as implying necessarily that a person leaves the place in which he is. Its etymological and its ordinary sense are to hide oneself ; and it matters not whether a person departs from a place or remains in it, if he conceals himself ; nor does the term apply only to the commencement of the concealment. If a person, having concealed himself before process issues, continues to do so after it has issued, he absconds".²

Refusal to accept a notice, abusing the process-server and walking inside the house do not amount to absconding.³

He may...abscond to avoid the issue of process, and this would not be an offence punishable under s. 172...When he knows, or has reason to believe, that it has issued, he may be unwilling to show contempt of the authority of the Court or officer who has issued it, and may comply with it, or so conduct himself that service may be effected; but he can hardly be said to be guilty of contempt of authority if he does not know, and has not reason to believe the authority has been exercised, nor to be absconding to prevent the service of a process, if he does not know, nor has reason to believe, that it has issued".⁴

'Summons, notice or order'.—For the service of 'summons' see ss. 69-74, Criminal Procedure Code. A warrant addressed to a police-officer is not a 'summons, notice or order';⁵ nor a warrant addressed to a Nazir by a civil Court for the arrest of a defendant in execution of a decree.⁶ Because from the wording of the section it appears that 'the summons, notice or order' therein referred to should be addressed to the same person whose attendance is required and who absconds to avoid being served with such 'summons, notice or order'. A warrant is not an order served on an accused, it is simply an order to the police to arrest him.⁷ This section does not cover the absconding from a warrant of arrest.⁸ But this section is held applicable to a witness who absconds to evade the service of a warrant issued by a Magistrate under ss. 181 to 196 of the Criminal Procedure Code.⁹ This section was also held applicable where the accused who was placed in charge of certain attached property did not produce it for sale and evaded the service of notice to produce it.¹⁰

2. 'Proceeding from any public servant legally competent...to issue such summons, etc.'—The liability of the accused depends upon the legal competence of the officer to issue the 'summons, etc'.¹¹

3. 'If the summons, etc., is to attend, etc.'—This shows that existence of a summons, notice or order is necessary to constitute the offence. It is not sufficient to show that a person apprehending that a process will be issued has absconded. He may do so in the hope that his absence will deter the Court or officer from issuing the process, and he would not be guilty of an offence under this section.

See s. 20, supra, as to the meaning of 'Court of Justice.'

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the process in question was a summons, notice or order.

- (2) That the same was issued by a public servant.
- (3) That such public servant was legally competent as such to issue it.
- (4) That such process was issued in order to be served on the accused.
- (5) That the accused absconded in order to avoid being served with such process.

For the second clause of the section prove further—

(6) That the process required the attendance of the accused (either personally or by his agent) or required the production of a document by him (either personally or by his agent).

(7) That such attendance or production was to be in a Court of Justice.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.¹² or intentionally prevents the lawful affixing to any place of any such summons, notice or order, or intentionally removes any such summons, notice or order from any place to which it is lawfully affixed, or intentionally prevents the lawful making of any proclamation, under the authority of any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to direct such proclamation to be made,

shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the summons, notice, order or proclamation is to attend in person or by agent, or to produce a document in a Court of Justice, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section punishes intentional prevention of the service of summons, notice or order. What is required is some act of opposition offered to the officer serving the summons.¹³ A refusal to sign a summons,¹⁴ a refusal to receive a summons,¹⁵ throwing down of a summons after service,¹⁶ a refusal to accept a citation issued under s. 147 of the United Provinces Land Revenue Act (U. P. Act III of 1901) or to sign the duplicate thereof,¹⁷ and a refusal to take subpoena under s. 160 of the Criminal Procedure Code,¹⁸ do not constitute the offence of intentionally preventing the service of a summons. The words "prevents the serving on himself" are not applicable to a case where the summons is tendered and refused, inasmuch as tendering is in itself good service. Under the Code of Criminal Procedure the mere tender to a person of a summons is sufficient, and a refusal by him to receive it does not constitute the offence of intentionally preventing service thereof on himself under this section.¹⁹ A person who gets away from the serving officer and shuts himself in his house is intentionally preventing service either by tender or by delivery within the meaning of this section.²⁰

Refusal to serve as special constables.—In a case of dispute regarding the right to the possession of an estate between two parties, one of whom was represented by the Court of Wards, the Magistrate of the District took up the cause of the latter, and alleging that it would be impossible to preserve the peace without employing a special police force, appointed the active men of the opposite party as special constables, and, on the latter refusing to serve as such, proceedings under this section were drawn up against them. It was held that the charge under this section had no relation to the offences alleged, and the proceedings thereunder were quashed.²¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the process in question was a summons, notice or order, or a direction for a proclamation.

(2) That the same was issued or made by a public servant legally competent to issue such process; or that such public servant was legally competent to direct such proclamation to be made, the same being lawful, and under his authority.

(3) That such summons, notice or order, was issued to be served either upon the accused, or upon some one else; or that such summons, notice or order, had been, or was to be, lawfully affixed to some place; or that such proclamation was about to be made.

(4) That the accused prevented such service of the summons, notice or order; or that he prevented the affixing of such process; or that he removed the same when so affixed; or that he prevented the making of such proclamation.

(5) That the accused did as above intentionally.

For the second clause of the section prove further—

(6) That the process or proclamation required the attendance of the accused (either in person or by agent) or the production of a document; and

(7) That such process or proclamation was to attend or to produce the document in a Court of Justice.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.²²

174. Whoever, being legally bound to attend in person or by an agent at a certain place and time in obedience to a summons, notice, order or proclamation proceeding from any public servant¹ legally competent, as such public servant,² to issue the same, intentionally omits to attend at that place or time, or departs from the place where he is bound to attend before the time at which it is lawful for him to depart,³ shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the summons, notice, order or proclamation is to attend in person or by agent in a Court of Justice, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months; or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

The offence contemplated by this section is an omission to appear at a particular time and at a particular place before a specified public functionary in obedience to a summons, notice or order, or proclamation not defective in form.

Ingredients.—The section requires three essentials—

1. That a summons, notice, order, or proclamation for attendance must be issued by a public servant who was legally competent to issue the same.

²² Criminal Procedure Code, s. 195. See ss. 476-478, 487.

2. That the person summoned must be legally bound to attend at a certain place and time in obedience to the summons, notice, order or proclamation proceeding from the public servant.

1. 'Legally bound to attend in person...at a certain place and time in obedience to a summons, etc., proceeding from any public servant.'—A conviction cannot be had, unless the person summoned was legally bound to attend, and refused or intentionally omitted to attend.²³ Where the presence of a person cannot be compelled, refusal to appear does not amount to an offence under this section. Thus where the presence of a tout could not be compelled under s. 36 of the Legal Practitioners Act to show cause or to receive orders in the case, it was held that no offence under this section was committed.²⁴

'Certain place and time.'—It must be proved that he had notice to appear at a certain place and time and omitted to do so.²⁵ Where a summons did not mention the place at which, or the time of the day when, the attendance of the person summoned was required, it was held that such person could not be punished under this section.² Disobedience to a summons, directing a person to appear at such place in camp as the Magistrate might be on the date fixed, is not punishable.³ A verbal order not specifying the particular day on which a person is to appear is not a lawful order.³

The place where a person is summoned to attend must be in British India. It is not, therefore, an offence to disobey a summons issued by a British Magistrate directing the person summoned to appear before him at a place outside the British territory.⁴

'Summons.'—A summons should be clear and specific in its terms as to the title of the Court, the place at which, the day and the time of the day when, the attendance of the person summoned is required, and it should go on to say that such person is not to leave the Court without leave, and, if the case in which he has been summoned is adjourned, without ascertaining the date to which it is adjourned.⁵ It must be one which could lawfully be issued;⁶ hence, a summons to take away a bundle of leases for distribution is not such a summons.⁷

Where a summons is not sealed as required by Madras Act III of 1869, s. 2, under which it is issued, the conviction is bad.⁸

The issue of a citation to an alleged defaulter under s. 147 of the United Provinces Land Revenue Act, 1901, does not involve him in any legal liability to attend, and non-compliance with it does not render him guilty of an offence under this section.⁹ The Oudh Chief Court has differed from this view.¹⁰

'Order.'—A verbal order given to a witness by a Court to attend on a particular day at a particular hour is an order the disobedience of which is punishable under this section.¹¹ The order should be directed or addressed to the accused.¹²

Order to attend necessary.—A Munsif called upon a Vakil to show cause why a report should not be made against him to the High Court for gross professional misconduct. The Vakil put in a written explanation and the matter was ordered to be put up on a certain date for orders. On the day fixed he did not appear and a proceeding was drawn up for his prosecution. It was held that as there was no order enjoining upon the Vakil to appear personally before the Munsif the proceeding should be quashed.¹³

In the absence of an order in writing as required by s. 162, Criminal Procedure Code, a person who is asked orally to appear before a police-officer as a witness, does not commit an offence under this section for non-appearance.¹⁴

'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra. A receiver appointed under the Land Registration Act (Beng. Act VII of 1876, s. 56) is not a public servant within the meaning of this section.¹⁵

2. 'Legally competent, as such public servant.'—The public servant must be legally competent to issue summons, etc. If he is not legally competent to issue the summons, notice or order in virtue of which the attendance of the accused is required, no offence is committed.¹⁶ Disobedience to a summons issued by a Village Magistrate who has no jurisdiction over the offence is not punishable under this section.¹⁷ Similarly, disobedience to an order of a police-officer which he is not competent to issue is not punishable under this section.¹⁸ The Chairman of a Municipality, although a public servant, is not legally competent as such to issue an order for attendance before him; and disobedience to such an order is not an offence within the meaning of this section.¹⁹ It was held similarly where a Tahsildar,²⁰ a Mahalkari,²¹ a Mamlatdar,²² and a Receiver²³ having no jurisdiction issued summonses for attendance, where a Collector issued a notice under s. 193 of the Land Revenue Act when there was no investigation, suit or other business before him;²⁴ and where a Sub-Deputy Collector issued a notice under s. 8 of the Chowkeedaree Act (Beng. Act VI of 1820) for attendance.²⁵

The accused were appointed arbitrators in a civil suit. They were summoned to attend the Court on a certain day, but did not obey the summons. It was held that they could not be convicted under this section as the summons in question was a process not provided for by the law.¹

3. 'Intentionally omits to attend at that place or time, or departs... before the time.'—The omission to appear in answer to the summons must be intentional.² If the witness explains his inability to the process-server that he will not be able to attend, he does not "intentionally" disobey the summons.³ It must be proved that the non-attendance was in the nature of a wilful disobedience.⁴ Before conviction the Court is bound to decide whether there was an intentional disobedience to the summons after giving the accused an opportunity of explaining his absence.⁵ If a person is sufficiently incapacitated by illness to have given up his ordinary avocations, this would be sufficient excuse for him not to attend a Court in obedience to a summons. The mere fact that he was not so dangerously ill that he could not be moved or that he did not send a man to inform the Court of his illness, would not render him punishable under this section.⁶ Non-attendance in obedience to a summons issued by a Sub-

Inspector of Police and served personally on an amin requiring him to give evidence at a police investigation constitutes an offence under this section.⁷

A man in obedience to a summons attended a Magistrate's Court at 10 A.M., but finding the Magistrate not present in Court at the time mentioned in the summons, departed without waiting for a reasonable time. It was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.⁸ But a person who departs without permission is not guilty under this section in the absence of a direction that he should not leave without permission.⁹

A witness was summoned by the High Court to give evidence and left the jurisdiction without being discharged as a witness and without the permission of the Court, in order to avoid giving evidence. It was held that such conduct amounted to contempt, and that the High Court had inherent jurisdiction to punish for that contempt, provided that this summary remedy was necessary as where proceedings in the ordinary course of law were not calculated to put a timely and efficient check upon the wrong-doer, and provided further that the specific offence was distinctly stated and the person in contempt had an opportunity of answering the charge.¹⁰

Public servant absent.—Where a public servant is absent on a date fixed in the summons, the person summoned cannot be convicted, though he purposely fails to attend.¹¹

Appearance through lawyer instead of in person.—Where a person did make an appearance, though not a personal appearance, on service of summons, it was held, under the circumstances, not to be an offence under this section.¹² But having regard to Sch. V of the Code of Criminal Procedure, if a summons require appearance in person, the accused is legally bound to attend personally and cannot appear by agent unless exempted under s. 205.

The petitioner, a practising barrister of the High Court, was summoned under the Motor Vehicles Act, but being unable to appear owing to professional work on that day applied for adjournment through counsel, which was granted. He was then prosecuted for failing to attend in answer to the summons and convicted under this section and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 5 or to suffer two days' simple imprisonment. It was held, in revision, that there was no intentional omission to appear, that as an officer of the Court it was the duty of the advocate no less to the Bench than to his own client to be ready when the case in which he was briefed was called, and that finding himself unable to abandon his client's interests he had instructed counsel to represent the matter to the Court, and that no offence under this section was committed.¹³

Personal service necessary.—Before the provisions of this section can come into play, personal service of summons must be attempted.¹⁴ Where a summons was shown to a person and taken back, it was held that it had not been served so as to render that person liable under this section for non-attendance.¹⁵ Service of a notice on the pleader of a party is not sufficient in criminal cases.¹⁶ The mere affixing of summons to the house of the person required to attend is not sufficient. It should be proved that it was brought to the knowledge of the accused that he was required to attend.¹⁷

Escape from custody.—The section does not apply to the case of a defendant escaping from custody under a warrant in execution of a decree of a civil Court.¹⁸

Madras Regulation IV of 1816.—The provisions of this section are not in conflict with the special provisions of ss. 15 and 16 of Regulation IV of 1816 (Madras). In ordinary cases obedience to the summons of a Village Munsif should be dealt with

Madras Act III of 1869.—There are several cases deciding whether disobedience to a summons issued by a Tahsildar under Act III of 1869 is punishable under this section or not.²⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the obligation to attend was in obedience to a summons, etc.

(2) That such summons, etc., was issued by a public servant, legally competent, as such, to issue the same.

(3) That the accused became thereby legally bound to attend, in person or by agent, at a certain place and time.

(4) That he omitted to attend at such place or time; or that he departed from the place before the time at which it was lawful for him to depart.

(5) That he did as above intentionally.

To bring the case within the second clause it must be further proved—

(6) That the summons or notice was to attend in person or by agent in a Court of Justice.

It must be proved that it was brought to the knowledge of the accused that he was required to attend and that he intentionally omitted to do so.²¹ The mere production of the summons to the accused with an endorsement of service is not sufficient proof of service in the absence of the evidence of the officer who is said to have served the summons.²²

A summons directing a person to appear within a certain number of days does not comply with the requirement of this section.²³

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

An offence under this section cannot be tried by a Magistrate in whose Court the accused has failed to appear. The prohibition is absolute and the consent or otherwise of the accused is immaterial.²⁴

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is necessary.²⁵ An offence under this section cannot be tried by the officer whose order is disobeyed.¹

175. Whoever, being legally bound¹ to produce or deliver up any document to any public servant,² as such, intentionally omits so to produce or deliver up the same, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the document is to be produced or delivered up to a Court of Justice,³ with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, being legally bound to produce a document before a Zila Court, intentionally omits to produce the same. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

COMMENT.

A witness who having a document does not produce it comes under this section and not under O. XVI, rr. 17-18, of the Civil Procedure Code.²

1. 'Legally bound.'—See s. 43, supra.

2. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra. The public servant must be legally competent to call for the document.

A receiver appointed under the Land Registration Act (Beng. Act VII of 1876, s. 56) is not a public servant within the meaning of this section.³

A person called upon by a Sub-Registrar to produce the original document, which was registered in his office, to enable him to compare it with the copy of the deed in the Registration Office Register, which, it was suspected, was tampered with, is not legally bound to produce it, and he cannot, on his failure to do so, be convicted under this section.⁴ Where an accused, while on his trial for offences under ss. 471 and 193 of the Penal Code, being directed to produce a certain incriminating document, did not produce the document and in consequence the prosecution against him failed, it was held that he could not be convicted for his omission to produce it.⁵ The amendment of s. 136 of the Civil Procedure Code by O. XI, r. 21, of the present Code, and the omission from r. 21 of all references to s. 188 or other sections of the Penal Code, indicate that a party to a suit, who fails to comply with an order for production or inspection of documents, can be punished only in the manner prescribed by that rule, and is not punishable under this section or any other section of the Code.⁶

3. 'Court of Justice.'—See s. 20, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that it was a public servant, or a Court of Justice, against whom the offence was committed.

(2) That the accused was legally bound to produce or deliver up the document in question to such public servant, or Court of Justice.

(3) That the accused omitted to produce or deliver up the document.

(4) That the accused did so intentionally.

The prosecution must prove that the accused was in possession of the document required to be produced; when it is doubtful which of the two accused had the document, they could not be convicted.⁷

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by the Court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of Ch. XXXV of the Criminal Procedure Code; or, if not committed in a Court, a Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class—Triable summarily.

When any such offence as is described in this section is committed in the view or presence of any Civil, Criminal or Revenue Court, the Court may cause the offender to be detained in custody, and at any time before the rising of the Court on the same day may, if it thinks fit, take cognizance of the offence and sentence the offender to a fine not exceeding two hundred rupees, and, in default of payment, to simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, unless such fine be sooner paid.⁸

A criminal Court inflicting a fine for contempt of Court should specifically record its reasons and the facts constituting the contempt, with any statement the offender may make, as well as the finding and sentence.⁹

A Court other than the High Court can try persons for offences committed before itself only in cases to which s. 477, or 480 or 485 of the Criminal Procedure Code is applicable, and none of the sections is applicable when the accused is charged under this section.¹⁰

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.¹¹

176. Whoever, being legally bound to give any notice or to furnish information on any subject to any public servant,¹ as such, intentionally omits to give such notice or to furnish such information in the manner and at the time required by law,² shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the notice or information required to be given respects the commission of an offence, or is required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence,³ or in order to the apprehension of an offender, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both;

or, if the notice or information required to be given is required by an order passed under sub-section (I) of section 565 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

Scope.—This section applies to persons upon whom an obligation is imposed by law to furnish certain information to public servants, and the penalty which the law provides is intended to apply to parties who commit an intentional breach of such obligation,¹² and not where the public servants have already obtained the information from other sources.¹³

When once the information of the fact of the crime has reached the police, the object of the section has been fulfilled and no further duty imposed by it remains.¹⁴ The fact that some persons bound to give information have given that information while other persons who might be bound to give information have omitted to do so is no ground for their prosecution under this section.¹⁵

Ingredients.—This section requires—

1. That a person must be legally bound to give any notice or to furnish information on any subject to a public servant.

2. That he has intentionally omitted to give such notice or information in the manner and at the time required by law.

1. 'Legally bound to give any notice or to furnish information..to any public servant.'—See s. 43, supra. To bring home the charge to the accused he must be shown to be legally bound to furnish information. Where a person is not legally bound to furnish information, this section does not apply. Thus where the owner of a house failed to give information to the police of suicide by a member of his family by falling into a well in the compound of his house, it was held that he was not guilty of an offence under this section because s. 45(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code imposes a duty on the owner of land of giving information of an offence and not on the owner of a house.¹⁶ It is submitted that if the house-owner was not the owner of the land on which the house stood, he was surely the occupier of that land and he was therefore guilty. Mere servants, for instance, who are dependent on their master, do not come within the category of persons legally bound to give information.¹⁷ Several Acts have imposed obligations on persons to give notice or information to public servants, e.g., the Foreigners Act;¹⁸ the Coroners Act;¹⁹ the Criminal Tribes Act;²⁰ the Dramatic Performances Act;²¹ the Indian Succession Act;²² the City of Bombay Municipal Act;²³ the Land Acquisition Act;²⁴ the Code of Criminal Procedure;²⁵ the Indian Registration Act;¹ the Indian Mines Act;² the Indian Works of Defence Act.³

Presumption of knowledge of offence.—The refusal by a person to join in a dacoity does not imply a knowledge on his part of the commission of that offence or render him liable under this section.⁴

2. 'Intentionally omits to give such notice...in the manner and at the time required by law.'—Where a person is under a legal duty to report certain facts and fails to report them, he must be presumed to intend to conceal them. Where a person failed to give information to the police of the explosion of fireworks, which resulted in the death of a child, as required by a statute, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.⁵ But where one of several persons bound to give information directed the village watchman to the knowledge of the others to make a report at the police-station and he neglected to do so, it was held that no offence was committed as it could not be said that the persons intentionally omitted to give the information.⁶

An act or omission is not an offence as that word is used in s. 40 of the Code if it is only punishable under some other enactment. Reading s. 40 the result follows that one who fails to furnish information, which he is legally bound to furnish, is punishable under this section, that he is legally bound to furnish what it is illegal for him to omit, that it is illegal for him to omit what is an offence and that an offence is what is punishable under the Code.⁷

3. 'If the notice, etc., respects the commission of an offence, or is required for...preventing the commission of an offence.'—This expression refers to the commission or prevention of some particular offence and not to the commission or prevention of offences generally.⁸

The word 'offence' here denotes a thing punishable under the Code or under any special or local law when punishable under such law with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards (s. 40).

Amendment.—The third clause to this section was added by Act XXII of 1989.⁹

CASES.

Omission to give information under s. 45, Criminal Procedure Code.—

An omission by an owner of a house to give information of a sudden or unnatural death¹⁰ is not an offence under this section, because owners or occupiers of houses in a village are not owners or occupiers of land under s. 45, Criminal Procedure Code.¹¹ In order to support a conviction under this section against a person for not giving information of an occurrence falling under clause (d) of s. 45, Criminal Procedure Code, it is not necessary to show that the death actually occurred on his land, when the circumstances disclosed show that a body has been found under circumstances denoting that the death was sudden, unnatural, or suspicious; the finding of the body being a fact from which a Court might reasonably infer, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the death took place there.¹² A village Magistrate was convicted under this section for omitting to furnish to the police information that a jewel of the daughter of a certain person was either stolen or lost. It was held that as the information did not relate to the commission of the non-bailable offence of theft, which the Village Magistrate was bound to communicate to the Magistrate or police, under s. 45(1)(c) of the Criminal Procedure Code, his conviction was illegal.¹³

Liability of Karnam.—A Karnam is legally bound to furnish true information regarding cultivation in his village.¹⁴ But a Karnam who omits to submit cultivation accounts of his village in obedience to the orders of the Revenue Inspector is not guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁵

Punjab Land Revenue Act.—Accused, a Zaildar, was convicted under this section for failing to give information of two cases of house-breaking, it being his duty under rule 25, framed under s. 28 of the Punjab Land Revenue Act, “to report heinous crimes to the Police and Magistrate.” It was held that, having regard to s. 43 of this Code, though a Zaildar was required by virtue of the rule to report, such rule did not cast upon him a legal duty to report, such as was imposed by a direct and express enactment of the Legislature, so that he could be held merely as a Zaildar to be “legally bound to give information” of the commission of a heinous offence.¹⁶ The accused, who was the sarbarah of a Zaildar, was convicted, under this section, of intentionally omitting to give information about a riot which occurred in his village which he was legally bound to furnish. It was held that even assuming that the duties and powers of a Zaildar’s sarbarah were co-extensive with those of the Zaildar himself, the conviction could not be sustained, for a breach of the rules drawn up by the local Government in regard to Zaildars, though it might subject the Zaildar to the displeasure of his employer and possibly endanger his emoluments or position, could not be held to amount to a violation of a legal obligation within the meaning of this section, regard being had to the definition of the terms “illegal” and “legally bound to do”, in s. 43 of the Code.¹⁷

N. W. P. and Oudh Land Revenue Act.—A Jamabandi prepared under rules made under s. 234 of the N. W. P. and Oudh Land Revenue Act (III of 1901) is a register, and consequently if a Zamindar refuses to give the patwari of a village information as to the collection of rent made by him he is liable under this section.¹⁸

The mere fact that a Zamindar realized more than the recorded rent from his tenant for a long time without giving information about it to the officials concerned, did not render him liable to be convicted for an offence under this section read with s. 46 of the U. P. Land Revenue Act inasmuch as under the latter provision he was not legally bound to give the information in the absence of a requisition for such information from a public servant.¹⁹

The Central Provinces Land Revenue Act.—The appointment of a Mukaddum-gumasta under s. 137 of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act does not absolve the Mukaddum from all responsibility to perform the duties laid on a Mukaddum by s. 141 of the Act. Where a Mukaddum has received information that a non-bailable offence has been committed in a village of which he is Mukaddum, and he is aware that the Mukaddum-gumasta has omitted to make any report, it is his duty to make the report himself and his omission to do so is an offence under the section.²⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused knew of the circumstance, or had information in question.

(3) That such notice should have been given, or such information furnished, to a public servant.

(4) That he omitted to give such notice, or furnish such information, as required by law.

(5) That he omitted to do so intentionally.

For the second clause of the section prove further—

(6) That such notice or information had reference to the commission of the offence, or was required to prevent the commission of an offence, or in order to apprehend an offender.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Summary trial.

The offence under this section being of a different nature and constituted by an entirely different set of facts from one under s. 189, a conviction under s. 189 cannot be altered to one under this section.²¹

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.²²

Charge.—It is not necessary to frame a charge under this section as the offence is a 'summons' case, but if it is necessary to do so the charge should distinctly set forth the particular offence in respect of which the accused either omitted to give information, or gave information which he knew to be false; and it should appear precisely what his duty was in the matter.²³

Sentence.—A sentence under this section should commence at once according to the rule contained in r. 464 (2) of the Punjab Jail Manual and should not be postponed till the expiry of the term of imprisonment which the accused is undergoing in default of furnishing security.²⁴

177 Whoever, being legally bound to furnish information on any subject to any public servant,¹ as such, furnishes, Furnishing false information. as true, information on the subject which he knows or has reason to believe to be false,² shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both;

or, if the information which he is legally bound to give respects the Commission of an offence,³ or is required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, or in order to the apprehension of an offender, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A, a landholder, knowing of the commission of a murder within the limits of his estate, wilfully misinforms the Magistrate of the district that the death has occurred by accident in consequence of the bite of a snake. A is guilty of the offence defined in this section.

(b) A, a village watchman, knowing that a considerable body of strangers has passed through his village in order to commit a dacoity in the house of Z, a wealthy merchant residing in a neighbouring place, and being bound, under clause 5, section VII, Regulation III, 1821,²⁴ of the Bengal Code, to give early and punctual information of the above fact to the officer of the nearest police-station, wilfully misinforms the police-officer that a body of suspicious characters passed through the village with a view to commit dacoity in a certain distant place in a different direction. Here A is guilty of the offence defined in the latter part of this section.

Explanation.—In section 176 and in this section the word “offence” includes any act committed at any place out of British India, which, if committed in British India, would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460; and the word “offender” includes any person who is alleged to have been guilty of any such act.

COMMENT.

Section 176 deals with the omission to give information; this section, with the giving of false information. Under both the sections the liability depends upon legal obligation to give information. Persons who are not under any legal obligation to furnish information cannot be dealt with under these sections.

Scope.—This section contains two branches. The first branch—‘whoever being legally bound...or with both’—deals with the simple case of a person who, being legally bound to furnish true information to a public servant, furnishes false information to him. It, therefore, does not apply to any falsehood told to a public servant, but to such statements only as he is ‘legally bound’ (s. 43) to make.²⁵ Under the second branch—‘or if information...or with both’—the information which a person is legally bound to give ‘for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence’ relates not to commission of offences generally, but to the commission of some particular offence.¹ The section does not apply to the case of any person who is examined by a police-officer making a false statement, but to cases where, by law, land-holders or village-watchmen are bound to give information, and to other analogous cases of the same description.²

1. That a person must be legally bound to furnish information on a particular subject to a public servant.

2. That he must furnish, as true, information on that subject which he knows or has reason to believe to be false.

1. ‘Legally bound to furnish information...to any public servant.’—

Sections 44 and 45 of the Criminal Procedure Code legally bind persons to give information regarding certain offences. See s. 43, supra, as to the meaning of ‘legally bound.’

See s. 21, supra, as to the meaning of ‘public servant.’

Offence is committed if there is legal obligation to give information.—False reports by police-officers.—A police-officer at a police-station, who, being as such officer bound to enter all reports brought to him of cognizable or non-cognizable offences in the station diary, refused to enter a report made to him concerning the commission of an offence, and entered instead in the diary a totally different and false report as that which was made to him, was held guilty under this section.³ Where a police-officer who was bound to communicate information to his superior officer regarding the commission of a riot and to make an entry thereof in his diary, omitted to give such information, it was held that he was guilty under this section.⁴ Where a constable, whose duty it was to ascertain on his rounds whether certain notoriously bad characters were in their houses or not, falsely reported that they were, it was held that the offence fell within the first branch of this section.⁵

No offence where no legal obligation to give information.—False return to superior.—Where the accused submitted to his official superior a false ‘nil’ return of lands in his enjoyment and also made a false statement to the same effect in a revenue inquiry, his conviction under this section was not upheld as he was not ‘legally bound’ to furnish true information.⁶

False information to public servant.—A person attempted to obtain his recruitment in the police of a district by giving certain information which he knew to be false to the District Superintendent of Police. It was held that he did not thereby commit an offence under this section.⁷ Where a purchaser of a stamped paper, not bound by any law to furnish any information to a stamp-vendor, gave a false name, it was held that he committed no offence under this section.⁸

False representation in memorandum of appeal.—It is not an offence to make a false representation in a memorandum of appeal, not required by law to be verified.⁹

False information to Income-Tax Officer.—The provisions of s. 22 (2) of the Indian Income-tax Act are mandatory, and a person who has not been served with a notice under that section is not legally bound to furnish any information about his income to the Income-tax Officer and that a person who furnishes any false information to the Income-tax Officer, without having been served with such a notice, is not guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁰

False information by Municipal doctor.—The accused was a Medical Officer employed by a Municipality. Under an arrangement arrived at between Government and the Municipality, the accused was to carry out post-mortem examination of bodies sent to him by the police and to certify the result of the examination to the police in a form provided for the purpose. For each such examination the accused was paid a fee by Government. Two dead bodies were sent by the police to the accused for post-mortem examination. The accused, without opening either of the bodies, reported in the case of one that it was too decomposed to permit internal examination of organs; and, in the other, he furnished detailed information of the size, condition and weight of the organs. On a prosecution of the accused for furnishing false information, it was held that, in the absence of a contract between Government and the accused, the accused was not legally bound to furnish information and was therefore not guilty of an offence under this section.¹¹

2. 'Furnishes, as true, information on the subject which he knows or has reason to believe to be false.'—It is not necessary to prove an intention to defraud; it is enough to show that the information furnished as true was either known to be false or not believed to be true.¹²

3. 'If the information which he is legally bound to give respects the commission of an offence.'—'Offence' means a thing punishable under the Code or under a special or local law when punishable under such law with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards (s. 40). Such information must relate not to the commission of offences generally, but to the commission of some particular offence.¹³

4. 'Regulation III of 1821.'—This was repealed by Act XVII of 1862.

Amendment.—The Explanation was added by Act III of 1894, s. 5.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was legally bound to furnish the information in question to a public servant.

(2) That he did furnish certain information in pursuance of such obligation.

(3) That the information so furnished was false.¹⁴

(4) That he furnished it as true although he knew, or had reason to believe it, to be false.

For the second clause of the section prove further—

(5) That such information was with respect to the commission of an offence.

Procedure.—Not cognisable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, or first or second class—Summary trial if the offence falls under the first clause.

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is necessary.¹⁵

Charge.—If the offence comes under the second clause then a charge must be framed. It should run as follows :—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, being legally bound to furnish information on any subject, to wit—, furnished information which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be false [and the information which you were bound to give was in respect of commission (or prevention) of an offence (or apprehension of an offender)] and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 177 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

178. Whoever refuses to bind himself by an oath¹ or affirmation to state the truth, when required so to bind himself by a public servant² legally competent to require that he shall so bind himself, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Refusing oath or affirmation when duly required by public servant to make it.

COMMENT.

The refusal to take an oath amounts to contempt of Court. The person refusing may be dealt with under s. 480 of the Criminal Procedure Code summarily or the Court may proceed under s. 195 of the same Code. A witness in a civil case is entitled to payment of his expenses before he gives evidence. If he is not paid he is not bound to appear at all in answer to the summons, and it is no offence to refuse to give evidence on the ground of insufficient payment of expenses before the Judge has decided that the payment made was sufficient.¹⁶

1. 'Oath'.—See s. 51, supra. 2. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

Amendment.—The words "or affirmation" were added by The Indian Oaths Act (X of 1873), s. 15.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was required by a public servant to bind himself by an oath or affirmation to state the truth.

(2) That such public servant was legally competent to require that the accused shall so bind himself.

(3) That the accused refused to bind himself as required.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by the Court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of Chapter XXXV of the Code of Criminal Procedure; or, if not committed in a Court, a Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class—Triable summarily.

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.¹⁷

179. Whoever, being legally bound to state the truth¹ on any subject to any public servant², refuses to answer any question³ demanded of him touching that subject by such public servant in the exercise of the legal powers of such public servant, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Refusing to answer public servant authorized to question.

COMMENT.

The offence under the section consists in the refusal to answer a question which is relevant to the subject concerning which the public servant is authorized to inquire, or which at least touches that subject. If a person gives false answers then he will be guilty under s. 193 and not under this section.

Whether a person who has once committed an offence under the last section can be held to have committed a further offence under this section when he refuses to answer the questions put to him is undecided.¹⁸

1. 'Legally bound to state the truth'.—A person who is examined by a police-officer under s. 161, Criminal Procedure Code, is not legally bound to state the truth. The legal obligation to speak the truth when so examined existed under the Code of 1882; but the effect of the omission of the word "truly" in s. 161 of the present Code has been to do away with this legal obligation.¹⁹ A person cannot be convicted of this offence for refusing, when required by a police-officer, to look at the hands of a complainant and to answer whether there were any marks of tying with a rope on his hands.²⁰

Sections 121 to 132 of the Indian Evidence Act²¹ enable witnesses to refuse to answer certain questions.

Where, in a murder case, a witness persisted in refusing to answer material and important questions put to him repeatedly by the Court with the result that the Judge's attempt to get at the truth was partially frustrated, it was held that the witness was guilty under this section.²²

2. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

3. 'Refuses to answer any question'.—If a Judge asks questions with a view to criminal proceedings being taken against a witness, the witness is not bound to answer them, and cannot be punished for not answering them, under this section.²³

This section has nothing to do with the conduct of the accused in Court. It has no application to a refusal to plead to a charge. An accused who, on being charged before a Village Panchayat Court, said that he would not make any reply and remained silent, was held to have committed no offence under this section.²⁴

Complainant.—A complainant is not a witness punishable for refusing to answer.²⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was legally bound to state the truth to a public servant on the subject in question.

(2) That such public servant questioned him touching such subject.

(3) That such public servant was exercising his legal powers in putting such questions.

(4) That the accused refused to answer such questions.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by the Court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of Chapter XXXV of the Criminal Procedure Code; or, if not committed in a Court, a Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class—Triable summarily.

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.¹

180. Whoever refuses to sign any statement¹ made by him, when required to sign that statement by a public servant² legally competent to require that he shall sign that statement, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Refusing to sign statement.

COMMENT.

If a statement made to an officer of justice or other public servant is put into writing and the public servant being "legally competent to require" a person to sign that statement, does make the request, the refusal to sign under such circumstances constitutes the offence hereby made punishable.²

1. 'Statement'.—The statement must be such an one as the accused can be legally required to sign. See ss. 154, 164, 200, 364 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and s. 20 of the Coroners Act.³ An accused person who refuses to sign a statement made at his trial in answer to questions put by the Court, commits no offence under this section.⁴ But, if the accused refuses to sign his statement recorded under s. 364 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, he commits it.⁵ The inquest report is not a 'statement,' and a refusal to sign such a report is not punishable under this section.⁶

Deposition.—A witness is not legally bound to sign his deposition in a Revenue inquiry,⁷ nor is he bound to sign or affix his thumb-mark to his deposition in a civil case,⁸ consequently he cannot be convicted under this section for his refusal to sign it. Where a witness is bound to sign his deposition it is only after the evidence has been read over to him and he has admitted it to be correct and has refused to sign it that he will be guilty under this section.⁹

2. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra.

Refusal to sign receipt for summons.—A mere refusal to sign a receipt for summons is not an offence under this section.¹⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused made the statement.

(2) That he was required to sign such statement by a public servant.

(3) That such public servant was legally competent to require him so to sign it.

(4) That the accused refused to sign that statement.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by the Court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of Chapter XXXV of the Criminal Procedure Code; or, if not committed in a Court, a Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class—Triable summarily.

181. Whoever, being legally bound by an oath or affirmation to state the truth on any subject to any public servant or other person authorized by law to administer such oath or affirmation,¹ makes, to such public servant or other person as aforesaid, touching that subject, any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true,² shall be punished with imprisonment³ of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

False statement on oath or affirmation to public servant or person authorized to administer an oath or affirmation.

COMMENT.

This section may be compared with s. 191. Under it a false statement to any public servant is punishable. Section 191 is more general.

Ingredients.—This section requires—

1. That there must be a person legally bound by an oath or affirmation to state the truth on a subject to (a) a public servant, or (b) some other person authorized by law to administer such oath or affirmation.

2. That he must make to such public servant or other person as aforesaid a statement touching that subject which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true.

1. 'Legally bound by an oath or affirmation to state the truth on any subject to any public servant, etc.'—See s. 43, supra, as to the meaning of 'legally bound.'

See, s. 51, supra, as to the meaning of 'oath.'

See s. 21, supra, as to the meaning of 'public servant.'

'Authorized by law to administer such oath, etc.'—This section applies only where the public servant or other person is "authorized by law to administer an oath";¹² it does not apply where the public servant administers the oath in a case wholly beyond his jurisdiction;¹³ and also where he is not competent to take a statement on solemn affirmation.¹⁴ Where three persons, of whom one was a pleader, were tried together and convicted of having made false statements on solemn affirmation, about the same matter, in the course of an inquiry into the conduct of the pleader under the provisions of the Legal Practitioners Act, it was held that the conviction of the pleader was bad as his statement was improperly taken from him on solemn affirmation.¹⁵

In a petition of appeal from a conviction, the appellant falsely stated that the convicting Magistrate declined to summon his witnesses. The Magistrate to whom the appeal was preferred called upon the appellant to verify the allegation in the petition of appeal on solemn affirmation, and he did so. It was held that the appellant committed no offence under this section.¹⁶ After the death of an insured man, a person made a false affidavit about his age before an Honorary Magistrate in connection with the claim for the insurance money. It was held that he committed no offence under this section in the absence of any special stipulation that such an affidavit would be good evidence in any judicial proceeding relating to the claim. The Honorary Magistrate was not a Court or person authorized to administer oaths and affirmations within the meaning of s. 4 of the Indian Oaths Act.¹⁷

2. 'Makes to such public servant...any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true.'—The making of a false statement with no knowledge one way or the other as to its truth constitutes it a false statement since the person making it does not believe it to be true.¹⁸

3. 'Shall be punished with imprisonment.'—The sentence must include a term of imprisonment, however short, to which a fine may be added.¹⁹

Amendment.—The words "or affirmation" were inserted by the Indian Oaths Act (X of 1873), s. 15.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused took the oath, or made the affirmation in question.

(2) That the same was legally binding upon him.

(3) That such oath or affirmation was administered by a public servant or by a person authorized by law to administer the same.²⁰

(4) That the accused whilst so bound made the statement in question to such person.

(5) That such statement was made touching the subject on which he was thereby bound to state the truth.

(6) That what he so stated was false.

(7) That he then knew that his statement was false, or had reason to believe it was false, or did not believe it was true.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.²¹

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, being legally bound by an oath to state the truth, on a certain subject, to wit——, to——, a public servant (or person authorized by law to administer such oath) did make to such public servant (or person as aforesaid) touching that subject, a statement, which was false, and which you knew (or believed) to be false, to wit——, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 181 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

182. Whoever gives to any public servant any information¹ which he knows or believes to be false,² intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, such public servant—

False information with intent to cause public servant to use his lawful power to the injury of another person.

(b) to use the lawful power of such public servant to the injury⁴ or annoyance of any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(c) A falsely informs a policeman that he has been assaulted and robbed in the neighbourhood of a particular village. He does not mention the name of any person as one of his assailants, but knows it to be likely that in consequence of this information the police will make inquiries and institute searches in the village to the annoyance of the villagers or some of them. A has committed an offence under this section.

COMMENT.

The present section was substituted for the original section by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (III of 1895), s. 1. In the old section clause (b) stood first, and clause (a) second. The present alteration arose out of a case in which, information having been given by a man to the police that he had been robbed at a certain village, the police went down and made inquiries and gave a great deal of trouble and annoyance to the people. It turned out that the information was absolutely false, but on prosecution the High Court of Calcutta held that inasmuch as it was not intended, or could not be shown that it was intended, to injure or annoy any particular person, the case did not fall within the section in question.²² The present section has been introduced to amend that, and to say that if such information is given the person giving it should be punished whether any particular person was aimed at or not. That is to say, it has been made an offence to give false information which misleads a public servant into doing what he ought not to do, whether that can be shown to be intended for the purpose of injuring any particular person or not.²³

Object.—The intention of the Legislature in drawing up this section is that a public servant should not be falsely given information with the intent that he should be misled by a person who believed that information to be false, and was intending to mislead him.

“Suppose a man, knowing the statement to be untrue, but intending the Magistrate to act upon it, informed the Magistrate of the district that a violent fire was raging in a city in the district of which he had charge. Now if the Magistrate believed that statement he would naturally send as many police as he could spare to assist in quelling the fire and keeping order. He might possibly also ask for the assistance of the military, if there were any in the neighbourhood. That would be a perfect example of a hoax, and I have not a doubt that it would come within s. 182, whether the Magistrate acted upon the information or not. To take another example of a case which in my opinion would come within the section, although the public servant was not induced to take action or to omit to take action upon the information given to him. Let us say that a man had absconded for an offence from Allahabad, and that it was surmised that he would seek to escape at one of the shipping ports. Information of his having absconded would be communicated to those ports, Calcutta amongst the number. A person who, knowing that that man had not been arrested, and intending, that the authorities at Calcutta should cease to watch the outward-bound shipping, telegraphed to the authorities at Calcutta informing them that the absconder had been arrested elsewhere, would in my opinion have committed an offence under s. 182, although the public servant at Calcutta had not acted on the telegram, but had persisted in his surveillance of the outward-bound shipping.”²⁴

Scope.—This section makes punishable the positive act of giving false information. There is nothing in the section showing that it intends to punish the withholding of information as distinct from the actual giving of information.²⁵ A person can be prosecuted under this section even after the dismissal of his complaint to a Magistrate. A person gave false information to the police and subsequently made a complaint to a Magistrate and the Magistrate issued a summons to the accused to appear but the complainant did not appear at the time of the hearing and the police reported that the complaint was false. After the discharge of the accused the police-officer to whom the complainant had given information laid a complaint and preferred a charge under this section. It was held that the complainant's making a complaint to a Magistrate and then dropping the proceedings was no bar to the police-officer acting under this section.¹

This section makes no distinction between information relating to a cognizable offence and one relating to a non-cognizable offence, nor is there anything in that section to justify the conclusion that it applies only to cases in which the information given to any public servant relates to a cognizable offence. When a false report is made to the police the question in deciding as to whether it amounts to an offence under this section is not whether the report is one of a cognizable crime but whether it is of such a nature as might be supposed to lead the police to make use of their lawful powers to the injury or annoyance of any person.²

Difference between s. 182 and s. 211.—The offence under this section is a distinct offence from that described in s. 211, which relates to an attempt to put the criminal Courts in motion against a person. The circumstances which are necessary to bring a case within this section involve different considerations from those that arise from s. 211. This section does not necessarily impose upon the person giving information to an officer criminal liability for mere want of caution before giving that information. There must be positive and conscious falsehood established.³ To constitute an offence under s. 182, the information given to a public servant should not only be false in fact but it must be false to the knowledge or to the belief of the informant and it is not sufficient that the accused had reasons to believe it to be false; whereas, under s. 211 it is sufficient if the accused makes his complaint without any just grounds and when he acts without due care or caution. See Comment on s. 211 where the difference between this section and s. 211 is further discussed.

When either of the sections 182 and 211 is applicable at the instance of a Police Superintendent or a Magistrate, the discretion or power of one or the other to proceed is not limited in any way whatever by the discretion vested in the other.⁴

1. Giving of an information to a public servant.
2. The information must have been known or believed to be false by the giver.
3. The information must have been given with the intention to cause, or knowing it likely that it will cause, such public servant (a) to do or omit anything which he ought not to do or omit to do if the true facts were known to him, or (b) to use his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of any person.

1. 'Gives to any public servant any information.'—The Bombay High Court has held that any 'false' information given to a public servant, with the intent mentioned in the section, is punishable under it, whether that information is volunteered by the informant, or is given in answer to questions put to him by the public servant.⁵ The Patna High Court has adopted this view. Where the driver of a motor car who was driving without a license when asked for his name by a police-officer gave a fictitious name, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.⁶ The former Chief Court of the Punjab had laid down that the expression 'gives information' means to volunteer information and is not intended to apply to a statement made in answer to questions put by a public servant.⁷ But this view has not been accepted by the Lahore High Court which has held that a person who makes a false statement in a departmental inquiry comes within the purview of this section notwithstanding that it was made in answer to questions.⁸ The former Judicial Commissioner's Court,

Upper Burma, had ruled that false answers to questions put by a police-officer in the course of investigation of a cognizable offence did not fall under this section.⁹ But the Rangoon High Court has held that the word 'gives' should not be restricted to imply 'volunteers'. A certain building was burnt down and a first information report was lodged. While the inquiry was pending, the accused was examined by the investigating officer, who took down his statement which was not signed by the accused. On the accused being charged with an offence under this section it was held that the statement made by the accused was not an information given to a police-officer but was made under s. 161 of the Criminal Procedure Code.¹⁰ A statement made by a witness to the police under the provisions of s. 161, Criminal Procedure Code, is not an information given to a public servant within the meaning of this section.¹¹ The Patna High Court has held that the meaning of the word 'information' is not so restricted as to refer only to a first information recorded under s. 154, Criminal Procedure Code. The word is used with reference not to a police-officer but to any public servant, and the section is applicable to a statement made during the investigation of a case.¹² Where information has already been given and the law has already been set in motion, the statement made by the informant to a police-officer in the course of investigation cannot be regarded as an information.¹³

If the false information is given to a person who is not a public servant, the offence will be that of defamation.¹⁴

See s. 21, supra, as to the definition of 'public servant'.

No offence under this section can be made out in respect of a false information given to a police-officer of a Native State.¹⁵

Statement made by accused in his defence.—Statements made by an accused for the purposes of his defence do not fall under this section.¹⁶ Where the petitioner on being questioned by a Superintendent of Police whether he was the author of certain mischievous articles that appeared in a paper said he was not the author but some one else was when in reality he was the author, it was held that as the statement was given merely in defence or excuse he was not guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁷ In a petition of appeal from a conviction, the appellant falsely stated that the convicting Magistrate declined to summon his witnesses. The Magistrate to whom the appeal was preferred called upon the appellant to verify the allegations in the petition of appeal on solemn affirmation, and he did so. It was held that the appellant had not committed an offence under s. 181 or this section.¹⁸

Statement made by accused in his application for transfer of his case.—In support of an application to transfer a case, a person swore to an affidavit and handed it over to the pleader of the applicant who filed it in Court. The affidavit contained allegations which were subsequently found to be false. The deponent was prosecuted under this section. It was held that the affidavit having been given to the applicant's pleader on his behalf and as it was open to the applicant to instruct his pleader not to file the same there was no information given to a public servant within the meaning of this section.¹⁹ Where the accused, in support of an application for the transfer of the case against him to some other Magistrate, made unfounded and defamatory allegations against the trying Magistrate, the Allahabad High Court held that he could not be prosecuted under this section.²⁰ The Lahore High Court has dissented from this view. It has held that an application for transfer is not a part of the defence of an accused person and statements made by an accused in an affidavit in support of an application for transfer do not enjoy the immunity conferred by s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code upon answers to questions put to the accused by the Court.²¹

Mere belief is not 'information' under this section.—Where a person falsely informed a Collector that certain Zamindars had usurped possession of certain land belonging to Government, with the intent "to give trouble to such Zamindars, and waste the time of the public authorities", it was held that as the information was no more than an expression of a private person's belief or opinion that the Collector might, if he chose, sustain a civil action against them, this was not the information contemplated by this section.²² Where a person in whose house theft took place informed the police that he suspected two persons whom he named as the perpetrators of the crime, it was held that that did not amount to giving false information.²³

Information must be given by accused.—When the information on which proceedings are taken is not given by the accused, a conviction under this section cannot stand. One S made a report at a police-station. On inquiry the investigating police-officer came to the conclusion that the report was false and that it had been made at the instance of one U. The Sub-Inspector sent a report to the Assistant Superintendent of Police asking that action should be taken under this section against S and U. The Assistant Superintendent of Police declined to take action, but sent the report to the Sub-divisional Magistrate, who took cognizance of an offence against S and U under this section. It was held that the Sub-divisional Magistrate had no jurisdiction to take any action under this section. Report of a police-officer was not a complaint under s. 195 (1), Criminal Procedure Code. U, not having given the information himself, could not be prosecuted under this section.²⁴ Where one person makes a report false to his knowledge that certain persons had collected in a suspicious manner, with the object of causing the police authorities to commence criminal proceedings against them in respect of an offence which they had not committed, and another person corroborates him, the report is made jointly by them and they both are guilty of an offence under this section.²⁵

2. 'Knows or believes to be false'.—The information given should be information which the accused knew or believed to be false.¹ There must be positive knowledge or belief that it is false.² The accused cannot be convicted if he shows that he had reasonable grounds for believing the information to be true. He is not bound to show that it was in fact true.³

Where the accused falsely telegraphed to a District Magistrate that a town was attacked by a gang of 200 robbers, and the Magistrate put no faith in the telegram and took no action, it was held that the accused were guilty of the offence under this section.⁴ An offence, constituted by a false complaint against unknown persons, falls under this section and not s. 211. It is, therefore, within the competence of the police authorities to complain of that offence and within the competence of the Magistrate to issue summons under this section.⁵ Where the accused got enlisted in the police force calling himself jat being an ahir, a caste whose enlistment was prohibited, it was held that this offence was committed.⁶

Where a person made a report of theft in the police station and named six persons as suspects, and the investigating officer treated it as false, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section, because the opinion of the officer was not legal evidence and could not be made the basis of a finding.⁷

3. 'To do or omit anything which such public servant ought to do or omit'.—It is not necessary that the public servant to whom false information is given should be induced to do anything or to omit to do anything in consequence of such information. The gist of the offence is not what action may or may not be taken by the public servant to whom false information is given; but the intention or knowledge (to be inferred from his conduct) of the person supplying such information.⁸ The public servant must be legally competent to act on the information given. Asking a public servant to do an act which would be an illegal act, even if true facts were stated to him, would not come within the purview of this section. The information must be information regarding a fact which would induce the public servant to do something which he would be legally competent to do if he had been cognizant of the true facts.⁹ Where a person gave a false information to a Village Magistrate with the view to it being passed on to another officer (Station-house officer) charging another with having committed an offence, he was held guilty under this section.¹⁰ Information given to A (the Village Magistrate) for the purpose of being passed on to B (the Station-house officer) and which it was his bounden duty so to pass on must be considered as having been given to B so as to justify his taking the complaint in writing from the accused under s. 154, Criminal Procedure Code.¹¹ A false report to the police regarding the commission of a non-cognizable offence does not come under this section.¹² Under this clause it is not necessary to show that the act done will be to the injury or annoyance of any third person.¹³

The words "ought not to do or omit" imply duty and exclude personal choice. The word 'omit' indicates an operation on the mind of the officer which has a result of making that officer give up a purpose which he otherwise would have pursued. It does not indicate placing an obstacle in the way of the officer performing his duty and thus preventing or making it more difficult for him to carry out an intention which was in his mind.¹⁴

4. 'To use the lawful power . . . to the injury'.—See s. 44, supra, as to the meaning of 'injury'. Where a person gives false information to an officer who can exercise his power to the direct and immediate prejudice of another against whom the information is levelled, this offence is complete.¹⁵ When a false report is made to the police, it is not necessary that the report should be of a cognizable crime, the report should be of such a nature as might be supposed to lead the police to make use of their lawful powers to the injury or annoyance of any person.¹⁶

Using lawful powers of public servant to the injury of another.—Where a person made a petition to the police falsely stating that he suspected another person of having committed an offence and prayed for an inquiry, it was held that he would come within the purview of this section as he had given false information with intent to cause a public servant to use his lawful powers to the injury of another person.¹⁷ P appeared before a District Magistrate and made a statement in which he accused a certain police-officer of having beaten him, demanded a bribe of him, and locked him up in the police cell. He stated, however, that he did not wish to make a complaint, but only desired that an inquiry should be made. Nevertheless the Magistrate examined P on oath, and, subsequently, the charge having been found to be baseless, P was convicted under this section and s. 198. It was held that, inasmuch as P had expressly stated that he did not wish to make a complaint, the statement must be taken to have been made to the District Magistrate, not as a Magistrate, but as head of the district police, and the conviction under s. 193 could not be upheld.¹⁸

A person stated to a police-officer—“I find there has been a theft: I suspect the persons named, and I want an inquiry to be made.” It was held that, if the statement was false, the offence committed fell under this section.¹⁹ Where a person falsely gave information to the police that a horse belonging to him had strayed, when in fact he had sold it some time previously, and did this with the intention that a charge should be brought against the purchaser, it was held that he was guilty under this section.²⁰

Where the accused had presented a petition to the District Magistrate, giving certain information against A, and praying that A should be proceeded against under s. 110, Criminal Procedure Code, and the District Magistrate considered such information to be false, it was held that the District Magistrate was right in granting sanction to prosecute the accused under this section, notwithstanding the fact that the petition containing the information was not signed by the accused.²¹

CASES.

Personation.—A personated B at an examination called the Vernacular Sixth Standard Examination. A passed the examination and obtained a certificate from the Educational authorities in B's name. B, thereupon, applied to the Assistant Collector to have his name entered in the list of candidates for Government service. He attached to this application the certificate issued in his name, and his name was ordered to be entered in the list of candidates. It was held that he was guilty under this section.²² B appeared before a Village Registrar and falsely personated W, and, in such assumed character, expressed a desire to execute a lease in favour of A, who was present and assented to take the lease. When B made some mistakes in giving the area of the land, C corrected him. E identified B as W before the Village Registrar and E and D assured the attesting witnesses that B was W. It was held that C, D and E could not be convicted under s. 82(d) of the Registration Act, 1877, but that they were guilty of an offence under this section.²³ A person signed a notice of transfer of survey numbers in the character of his father who was dead; and the declaration to the notice was signed by the accused who confirmed the assumed character. It was held that the accused was guilty of giving false information to a public servant.²⁴ By reporting falsely that his father had died the accused induced a Revenue Surveyor to enter his name in the Revenue Registers as owner of certain gardens and paddy lands in succession to his father. It was held that he had committed an offence under this section.²⁵

False statement in petition.—An accused who has made a false statement in a petition of appeal cannot be held to have committed an offence under this section, even assuming that the false statement was made with the object of inducing and it did induce the Appellate Court to send for the record of the case, as it cannot be said that the Court was thereby induced to do what it ought not to have done.¹ It was held similarly where the false statement was made in a memorandum of appeal.² Where a person submitted a petition of resignation to a Collector as the officer in charge of the Court of Wards and such petition contained an untrue account of an affray and defamatory statements and the Collector as District Magistrate ordered the petitioner's prosecution for giving false information under this section, it was held that no offence under it was committed.³

Income-tax return.—Where a person does not sign the declaration in his income-tax return as to his 'other sources of income', the mere mention of some source of income alone in a previous part of the return which was signed will not make the return 'false' within the meaning of this section.⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person to whom the information was given was a public servant.

(2) That the accused gave the information in question to that public servant.

(3) That such information was false.

(4) That the accused knew or believed such information to be false when giving it.⁵ The fact that an information is shown to be false does not cast upon the party who is charged with an offence under the section the burden of showing that, when he made it, he believed it to be true. The prosecution must make out that the only reasonable inference was that he must have known or believed it to be false.⁶

(5) That the accused intended thereby to cause, or knew that it was likely that he would thereby cause, such public servant to do or omit anything which such public servant ought not to do or omit if the true state of facts were known to him; or that he intended thereby to cause or knew that it was likely that he would thereby cause such public servant to use his lawful powers to the injury or annoyance of any person.

A decision in a previous case is not admissible to prove the falsity of the information given by the accused. Evidence must be adduced in their presence.⁷

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

Where as the result of a police investigation it appears that a complaint made to the police of the commission of an offence is false, it is not necessary that the complainant should be given any further opportunity of establishing the truth of his allegation before his prosecution under this section.⁸ There is no provision in law that before a Magistrate can inquire into a case under this section on the complaint of a police-officer, the accused person must have an opportunity of proving his case; he would have an ample opportunity of proving it when he would be called on to enter upon his defence. A prosecution under this section for laying a false charge at the police-station, which on investigation is found to be unfounded, is maintainable, though the Magistrate refuses the informant's petition for examining his witnesses and for judicial inquiry into the charge laid by him on the ground that he might prove his case and adduce the defence evidence at the trial.⁹

Before proceeding under this section, a Magistrate should inquire into and dispose of the original complaint or information.¹⁰ The Magistrate has no jurisdiction to order a prosecution for making a false complaint, till that complaint is finally determined.¹¹

An acquittal under this section is no bar to a subsequent prosecution under s. 500.¹²

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is necessary.¹³

The essence of an offence under this section is not the falseness of the information as it is the essence of an offence under s. 211 but the contempt of the lawful authority of the public servant and unless and until the public servant concerned chooses to move in the matter the Court has no authority to do so suo motu, by whatever process it reaches that result.¹⁴ A complaint under this section should contain the ingredients of the offence, for it is essential that the information given by the accused must have been known or believed to be false by him at the time when he gave it.¹⁵

Where an information to the police is followed by a complaint to the Court, then the Court must file a complaint even for the prosecution of the informant in respect of the false charge made to the police.¹⁶

A Deputy Magistrate has no power to question an order made by his superior.¹⁷

A complaint should not be instituted against a person without hearing the objection of that person.¹⁸

A person who lays information to the police is entitled to have his case judicially determined before he is called upon to answer the charge of giving false information under this section.¹⁹

Separate conviction for one statement.—An information was given to a police-officer in the course of which two persons were named in whose houses stolen property belonging to a certain individual would be discovered: on complaint, the information was found to be false, and the accused was convicted and punished for two offences under this section as affecting two different persons. It was held that he could be charged with having made only one false statement, and punished for one offence.²⁰

Venue.—Where the accused posted at Kumbakonam a letter, alleged to contain false information, to the District Superintendent of Police, Tanjore, which reached the addressee at Tanjore, it was held that the offence was completed only when the information reached the public servant and the offence should be taken to have been committed at Tanjore, and the Sub-Magistrate of Kumbakonam had no jurisdiction to try the case.²¹ But the Allahabad High Court has held that the Magistrate of the place where such letter is posted has jurisdiction to try the case.²²

183. Whoever offers any resistance to the taking of any property¹ by the lawful authority² of any public servant,³ knowing or having reason to believe that he is such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Resistance to the taking of property by the lawful authority of a public servant.

COMMENT.

The Bombay High Court has held that this section applies to resistance to the taking of property by lawful authority of a public servant, and there are no words in this section, as there are in s. 99, extending the operation of the section to acts which are not strictly justifiable by law. Resistance to an act of a public officer acting bona fide though in excess of his authority may give rise to some charge, in the nature of assault, but it cannot afford any foundation for a prosecution under this section.²³ The Madras High Court has held that in construing this section, "...the language of section 99, as well as that of other sections concerning resistance to the acts of public servants, must be borne in mind. Section 99 declares that the protection afforded by the Penal Code to public servants acting in good faith under colour of their office is not lost to them, by reason of any mistake on their part in their exercise of their proper functions. A public servant may do an act of a kind which he has no authority to do. In such case, he could not be acting in discharge of his public functions (sections

If, on the other hand, the act of the public servant is an act of the kind which the public servant is authorized to do, it is clear that no miscarriage on his part, due to an honest mistake of fact, could render him liable to a prosecution. Section 79 would afford him protection. Furthermore, resistance to such an act... is made punishable under section 188.²⁴

1. 'Offers any resistance to the taking of any property'.—See s. 22, supra, as to the definition of 'property'.

A decree having been passed against the assets of a deceased debtor, execution was taken out and an officer of the Court proceeded to seize certain goods. The accused successfully resisted the seizure asserting that the goods seized were his own. He was held guilty under this section.²⁵

Refusal is not resistance.—A mere refusal by any accused person to hand over to a bailiff money alleged to be in his pocket does not amount to a resistance to the taking of that money within the meaning of this section.¹ A mere objection to the seizure of certain articles does not amount to resistance.² A mere oral statement by a person claiming to be the owner of certain articles attached by a bailiff, to the effect that he would not permit the bailiff to take away the articles unless the bailiff entered them as his property does not amount to an offence under this section.³ But, where a person not only refused to give up the property but threatened to do harm to the police-officer if he ventured to carry out the warrant, it was held that he committed an offence under this section, since the threat was an overt act sufficient in law to constitute 'voluntary obstruction'.⁴ In the absence of a contract to the contrary, factors may, under s. 171, Indian Contract Act, retain, as security for a general balance of account, any goods bailed to them, and, therefore, where goods were entrusted to a certain firm for sale and subsequently the Court of Wards took over the management of the estate of the owner of the goods, the refusal on the part of the proprietor of the firm to deliver the goods to the Court of Wards until the general balance of his account was settled, was held not to render him liable to a criminal prosecution* for offering resistance to the taking of any property by the lawful authority of any public servant or for voluntarily obstructing a public servant in the discharge of his public functions.⁵

Obstruction to order of distraint.—A Village Munsiff has jurisdiction to distrain the property of a defaulter outside his jurisdiction for arrears of revenue in respect of land within his jurisdiction, though, in the demand notice authorizing him to distrain, he be not referred to by his name but by his office. Obstruction to such distraint outside the local limits of his jurisdiction is, therefore, punishable under this section.⁶ If the distraint is not bona fide a conviction under this section will not lie.⁷

2. 'Lawful authority'.—This expression does not necessitate that the cases in which the person charged may have a civil action against the public officer must be excluded from the operation of the section.⁸ "Taking the two [ss. 99 and this section] together, the reasonable construction to be put is that, if the officer acted in good faith under colour of his office, the mere circumstance that his 'act may not be strictly justifiable by law' cannot affect the lawfulness of his authority. And the chief reasons for this view are that the likelihood of serious injury resulting from such acts (excepting those tending to cause apprehension of death or grievous hurt) of persons clothed with public authority and subject to public responsibility is so small that the parties, whose rights are thus invaded, would be sufficiently protected by their being left to obtain redress solely by appealing to the constituted authorities in due course and that, in such cases, to secure an easy and peaceful execution of legal processes, it is necessary that recourse to self-help on the part of the persons affected should be disallowed".⁹

Lawful authority wanted.—Where a person resisted a peon in attaching property under a warrant, the term of which had already expired;¹⁰ where the warrant directing the attachment of property was not signed by the Judge or such officer as the Court might appoint;¹¹ where a Sheriff was resisted in attaching property under a defective warrant issued by a civil Court;¹² where a village watchman without the requisite written authority attached some property for levying the amount of arrears and resistance was offered to such attachment;¹³ and where a bailiff distrained some sheep and goats not belonging to the judgment-debtor but belonging to the person who resisted the distraint and who had a bona fide claim of right,¹⁴ it was held that the person resisting was not guilty of an offence under this section.

Where a Court peon removed movable property without giving any option to the judgment-debtor to provide safe custody for the property as required by High Court Circular Orders, it was held that the subsequent taking back of the said property by the judgment-debtor did not constitute an offence under this section.¹⁵ If a bailiff breaks the doors of a third person, in order to execute a decree against a judgment-debtor, he is a trespasser if it turns out that the person or goods of the debtor are not in the house; and, under such circumstances, the owner of the house does not, by obstructing the bailiff, render himself punishable under this section or s. 186.¹⁶ A cultivator of land was in arrears with his irrigation dues, which became recoverable as arrears of land revenue. He had grown sugar-cane on the land which he sold to a trader. The accused was employed by the trader to crush the sugar-cane and prepare jaggery. To recover the irrigation dues, the Talati of the place, acting under the orders of the Mamlatdar, attached the jaggery while it was being conveyed from the fields to a village. The accused delivered the jaggery to a shop-keeper on the way instead of taking it to the Mamlatdar's office, and for this act he was convicted of an offence under this section. It was held that the accused was not guilty of an offence under this section as the order of attachment was not valid and the property attached having been sold by the occupant it was no longer his property, and the accused was entitled to resist peacefully the wrongful act of the Talati in seizing the jaggery.¹⁷

Resistance to taking of property without warrant lawful.—It is the intention of the law that when a public servant attaches property under a warrant in execution of a decree, he must have the warrant with him, otherwise the taking of the property is not lawful.¹⁸

184. Whoever intentionally obstructs¹ any sale of property² offered for sale by the lawful authority of any public servant,³ as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Obstructing sale of property offered for sale by authority of public servant.

COMMENT.

This section punishes intentional obstruction of the sale of any property conducted under the lawful authority of a public servant. Notices given at public sales by persons having, or claiming, in good faith to have an interest in the property, will not be deemed an obstruction. But it will be otherwise if they are not given bona fide and merely for the purpose of injuring the sale.

1. 'Obstructs'.—The former Chief Court of the Punjab laid down that there must be something physical to constitute obstruction. Where during the sale of some land by a public servant the accused posted up placards asserting title to the land and warning bidders not to go in for it, it was held that the conduct of the accused did not amount to an obstruction within the meaning of this section as the obstruction was not physical.²⁰ But the Nagpur High Court has dissented from this view and held that this section does not deal with obstruction of any public servant or of any person, but with the obstruction of a proceeding conducted by a public servant, and a proceeding can be obstructed by measures other than physical taken against the person who is conducting it. No physical obstruction is necessary in order to complete an offence under this section. The use of abusive language by a person at an auction-sale conducted by a public servant makes him liable under this section.²¹ Where one person executed and another accepted a deed of sale of some property which was ordered to be sold in execution of a decree of a revenue Court, it was held that there was no obstruction to the sale within the meaning of this section.²² Because no effect whatever was produced on the sale by the existence of the deed.

2. 'Property'.—See s. 22, supra. 3. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the property was offered for sale.

(2) That such sale was by the authority of a public servant.²³

(3) That such authority was lawful.

(4) That the accused obstructed such sale.

(5) That he did so intentionally.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.²⁴ tend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section “makes it penal to bid at a public sale for property on account of a party who is under a legal incapacity to purchase it, or to bid for it not intending to complete the purchase, or as it is expressed to perform the obligations under which the bidder lays himself by such ‘bidding’ ”.²⁵

A person who bids for the lease of a ferry sold at a public auction and fails to complete the sale is guilty of contempt under this section.¹

1. ‘Any sale of property’.—Any kind of property whether corporeal or not is contemplated by the section.² A person who bid at an auction of the right to sell drugs within a certain area under a false name, and when the sale was confirmed in his favour, denied that he had ever made any bids at all, was held to have committed an offence under this section.³

2. ‘Public servant’.—See s. 21, supra.

3. ‘Legal incapacity’.—See s. 169, supra. If the accused at the time of making the bid brings a large sum of money for deposit as earnest money, but owing to circumstances over which he had no control is unable to deposit the earnest money and there is nothing to show that at the time he made his bid he was not a bona fide bidder and had no intention of performing the obligations under which he laid himself by such bidding, then his subsequent failure to deposit the earnest money cannot be made a penal offence punishable under this section.⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the holding of the sale.

(2) That such holding of the sale was by authority of a public servant.

(3) That such authority was lawful.

(4) That the accused bid for, or purchased such property, either for himself or for some other person.

(5) That the person for whom he bid or purchased (whether for himself or some one else) was under a legal incapacity to purchase at the sale in question.

(6) That the accused then knew of such incapacity.

It will also be sufficient to prove (1), (2) and (3) as above; and further

(4) That the accused bid for such property.

(5) That, when bidding, he intended not to perform the obligations under which such bidding placed him.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.⁵

186. Whoever voluntarily obstructs any public servant¹ in the discharge of his public functions,² shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Obstructing public servant in discharge of public functions.

COMMENT.

This is a general section and is applicable in every case where a public servant is obstructed in the discharge of his functions. Where the public servant is a judicial officer the procedure laid down in s. 480 of the Criminal Procedure Code may be followed.

This section does not deal with obstruction of any public servant or of any person but with the obstruction of a proceeding conducted by a public servant.⁶

The obstruction which is punishable by this section may be by an act voluntarily done or omitted in order to hinder the public servant in executing his duty. This section does not contemplate constructive obstruction to a judicial officer in the discharge of his judicial functions, even when they are of a quasi-executive character or when the proceedings before him are in execution.⁷

Ingredients.—This section requires two essentials—

1. Voluntary obstruction to a public servant.
2. Such obstruction must be in the discharge of public functions of such public servant.

1. 'Voluntarily obstructs any public servant'.—The use of the word 'voluntarily' indicates that the legislature contemplated the commission of some overt act of obstruction, and did not intend to render penal mere passive conduct.⁸ The word 'obstruction' means actual obstruction, i.e. actual resistance or obstacle put in the way of a public servant. The word implies the use of criminal force and mere threats or threatening language⁹ or mere abuse¹⁰ are not sufficient. The Nagpur High Court has held that there is an essential difference in the obstruction contemplated in s. 184 and this section. This section postulates some show of physical force whereas s. 184 does not.¹¹ During the execution of a warrant of possession the judgment-debtor and his men were drawn up and showed every intention of resisting by force. The judgment-debtor paraded the place in a defiant and angry mood. It was held that the act of the judgment-debtor constituted physical obstruction even though no physical force was actually brought into play at the time. It was not necessary for them actually to come to blows.¹²

The Allahabad High Court is of the opinion that the word 'obstruction' is not confined to physical obstruction and mere threats or threatening language is sufficient to constitute the offence under this section.¹³ Threats of violence made in such a way as to prevent a public servant from carrying out his duty might easily amount to an obstruction of the public servant, particularly if such threats are coupled with an aggressive or menacing attitude on the part of the person uttering the threats and still more so if they are accompanied by the flourishing or even the exhibition of some kind of weapon capable of inflicting physical injury. Threats made by a person holding an offensive weapon in his hands must be taken to be just as much an obstruction as that caused by a person actually blocking a gateway or handling a public servant in a manner calculated to prevent him from executing his duty.¹⁴

In a Bombay case, a Circle Inspector entered into the compound of the accused with a panch and a village servant, to remove a portion of the hedge which was an encroachment. When the servant employed his scythe to the hedge to cut it, the accused caught hold of the scythe and threatened him. The Circle Inspector, apprehending mischief, withdrew. It was held that the accused had committed an offence under this section, since his act in laying hold of the scythe was an act of physical obstruction, and the obstruction offered to the servant was tantamount to obstruction to the Circle Inspector under whose orders he was acting. The Court observed: "There is a difference between a case like this and one where a person merely dissuades other people from rendering certain services to a public servant, or spreads false reports so as to prevent parents bringing children for vaccination, and so on, in regard to which there are authorities for saying that there is no obstruction within the meaning of s. 186".¹⁵

A District Judge ordered that the house of the defendant, in a suit pending before him, be searched and certain property brought to the Court, and appointed a commissioner to carry out that order. The commissioner went to the house, but the defendant shut the doors and would not admit him. A crowd collected and the commissioner felt it would be unsafe to proceed to carry out the order by force and was unable to do so otherwise. It was held that the defendant committed no offence under this section.¹⁶ In a subsequent case the same High Court has held that shutting the door in an officer's face amounts to obstructing him in the performance of his duty.¹⁷

See s. 39, supra, as to the meaning of 'voluntarily'.

'Public servant'.—A vaccinator,¹⁸ a process-server,¹⁹ a union karnam,²⁰ a peon to whom execution of a warrant is delegated,²¹ and a Sanitary Inspector,²² are public servants within the meaning of this section; but not a person nominated by the Collector under the Bengal Tenancy Act for the purpose of making a division of crops between a landlord and tenant,²³ nor a receiver appointed under the Land Registration Act,²⁴ nor a Local Board Sircar.²⁵ See s. 21, supra, for the definition of the term 'public servant'.

2. 'In the discharge of his public functions'.—According to the Calcutta and the Lahore High Courts the 'public functions' contemplated by this section mean legal or legitimately authorized public functions, and are not intended to cover any act, that a public functionary may choose to take upon himself to perform.¹ It must be shown that the obstruction or resistance was offered to a public servant in the discharge of his duties or public functions, as authorized by law. The mere fact of a public servant believing that he was acting in the discharge of his duties will not be sufficient to make resistance or obstruction to him amount to an offence.²

It has, however, been held by the Madras and the Allahabad High Courts that even though the act of the public servant is not strictly legal yet any obstruction caused to him when he is discharging his functions in good faith would come under this section.³ The Patna High Court has held in a case that although it is improper for a Nazir to depute one of his assistants to execute a warrant for the delivery of possession which is directed to the Nazir himself, yet the assistant is sufficiently clothed with authority to execute the warrant, and any person offering resistance or obstruction to its execution is guilty of an offence under this section.⁴ It has further held that if a public officer does no more than act upon the official instructions he has received and if those official instructions are not of such a kind as to be obviously and patently illegal then he acts properly in carrying out orders and resistance to a public officer carrying out orders which upon the face of them are not open to objection and are in proper form is an offence against the statute. A Court should look at the warrant of attachment and see whether the officer was doing something which was not contained in the writ of attachment which would have justified reasonable resistance and only such reasonable resistance as was necessary for the purpose of resisting an unlawful act. Where a bailiff who got a process of attachment under Order XXI, r. 43, of the Civil Procedure Code, for seizure of certain property failed to comply with the instructions contained in the High Court General Rules, and he was obstructed by the judgment-debtors in effecting his seizure and removing the attached property, it was held that the judgment-debtors were guilty under this section.⁵ Where an officer is entrusted with a warrant to attach the property of certain persons, his first duty is to ascertain by all means possible what property belongs to that person which is liable to be attached. Having satisfied himself that certain property belongs to that individual, it is his duty to attach that property unless some objection is raised which raises in his mind a reasonable doubt that the property does not belong to the person against whom the warrant has been issued.⁶

The decisions of the Bombay High Court are not unanimous on the point. It has held in two cases that if a public servant bona fide believed that he was discharging his public functions within the scope of his authority, even though he was mistaken as to the extent of his powers, an obstruction caused to him would be punishable under this section.⁷ Where an officer, subordinate to an officer in charge of a police-station, was deputed by the latter to make an inquiry under s. 135, Criminal Procedure Code, attempted without a search-warrant to enter into a house in search of property alleged to have been stolen, and was obstructed and resisted, it was held (applying s. 99 of the Indian Penal Code) that, even though the police-officer was not strictly justified in searching the house without a warrant, the person resisting and obstructing could not set up the illegality of the officer's proceeding as a justification of his obstruction, as it was not shown that the officer was acting otherwise than in good faith and without malice.⁸ But in subsequent cases it has held that even though a public servant is acting in good faith, if the order under which he acts is illegal or ultra vires, any obstruction caused to him would not be punishable under this section.⁹ The public servant's intentions may have been perfectly honest, but if in fact and in law the functions in the discharge of which he is obstructed are not public functions, then no offence is committed. The functions will not be public functions if they fall wholly outside the jurisdiction of authority which he as a public officer possesses.¹⁰ The accused, a timber merchant, purchased certain timber in the Central Provinces and brought it into East Khandesh. The merchant from whom he purchased had brought it from the Indore State. A Forest Ranger of East Khandesh being of opinion that the timber was liable to duty under a notification which levied duty on all timber brought into East Khandesh from the Indore State went to the accused's timber yard, demanded the payment of duty, and proceeded to search for the dutiable timber in the yard. The accused refused to pay the duty and did not allow the Ranger to search for or remove the timber. On a prosecution of the accused for an offence under this section it was held that, as neither s. 39 of the Forest Act nor the notification thereunder sufficed to make any duty leviable in respect of the timber which the accused had purchased bona fide in the Central Provinces, the Ranger was acting wholly outside his jurisdiction or authority and the accused was not guilty of an offence under this section.¹¹ The Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Sind has held likewise.¹²

The order or a warrant under which a public servant acts must be a lawful one and the public servant who executes the order or warrant must be clothed with lawful authority under the order or warrant to execute it. See cases noted below.

Civil process.—The resistance to a process of a civil Court is punishable under this section.¹³ By obstructing the execution of a process of law the offender commits two offences; one is the alleged obstruction and the other is the contempt of Court, the offender being deemed to have undermined the authority of that Court. The first offence is covered by the Penal Code, while the second one is not.¹⁴

CASES.

Obstruction in discharge of public functions.—The accused's son strayed away from his home. He was found at a police out-post, some distance from a thana, and was sent into the thana under the charge of a watchman. Near the thana the accused met the watchman and claimed his son. The watchman told him that he would get his son when the thana was reached. The accused accompanied the watchman remonstrating and quarrelling with him for not giving up his son. On reaching the thana the accused refused to allow his son to be taken inside, and said that his son was not a thief that he should be taken into the thana. He took away his son and used bad language. It was held that he had committed an offence under this section as he had obstructed the police in the discharge of their duty.¹⁵ Whilst the complainants, a Sub-Inspector and a constable in the Abkari Department, were proceeding to search a man whom they suspected of possessing cocaine, the accused assaulted first the constable and then the Sub-Inspector, as a result of which the man escaped and the complainants could not search him. The accused was convicted of two offences punishable under s. 353 and one offence under this section. It was held that the accused was rightly convicted.¹⁶

Where the accused in whose room stolen articles were found by a police constable immediately caused the room to be shut and threatened to kill the constable if he removed the articles;¹⁷ where the accused seriously obstructed, insulted and jostled a process-server in the execution of his duty;¹⁸ where the accused caught hold of a scythe and threatened the man who was cutting a portion of his hedge, which was an encroachment, under the orders of a Circle Inspector;¹⁹ where the accused snatched away a copper pot which was attached by a revenue peon for recovery of arrears of assessment;²⁰ and where the accused resisted a Sanitary Inspector, authorized by the Chairman of a municipality, in his attempt to inspect and examine food,²¹ it was held that the accused were guilty of an offence under this section.

Where a cadastral surveyor, in effecting partition of lands under an order passed by a civil Court under O. XXVI, r. 13, of the Civil Procedure Code, much beyond the period stated in the order, was obstructed and assaulted when proceeding to take measurements, the persons obstructing were held guilty of offences punishable under ss. 186 and 353 of the Indian Penal Code. The Court observed that "a clear distinction can be drawn between the case where a public servant acts wholly without jurisdiction or on an entirely illegal authority and the case where he may be said under s. 99, I. P. C., to be acting in good faith under colour of his office though that act may not be strictly justifiable by law. Of the former class of cases the decisions in 13 Bom. 168, 15 Bom. L. R. 315, 29 Bom. L. R. 987, 22 Cal. 286, 23 Cal. 896, 24 Cal. 320 and 28 All. 481 are illustrations. Illustrations of the latter kind of cases are to be found in 29 Cal. 417 and 19 Mad. 349."²²

A search-warrant was addressed to a police-station and was endorsed by the officer in charge of the police-station to a constable who, when executing the warrant, was obstructed by the accused. The latter were tried for an offence under this section, and were convicted. Neither at the time of the search nor during their trial did they take any objection to the legality of the warrant. In revision it was urged that the warrant was illegal inasmuch as it was addressed to a police-station and not to any police-officer by name or by description. It was held that no objection to the legality of the warrant having been taken at the time of the search or at the trial, the conviction could not be set aside on that ground, which was merely an ex post facto attempt at justification.²³

An assessee having failed to pay the amount demanded from him on account of income-tax a certificate was issued and a distress warrant was served through a peon who attached a bullock belonging to the assessee. This was left in the custody of a surety. Later, a second peon was directed to realize the tax due by sale of the bullock previously attached, and, if the amount realized proved insufficient, by attachment and sale of other properties of the assessee. The surety having denied that he had received charge of the bullock or stood surety, the peon attached two other bullocks belonging to the assessee who, however, prevented their removal. The assessee having been convicted under this section, contended that the second peon was not justified in attaching the two bullocks until the bullock first attached had been sold. It was held that the warrant issued to the second peon amounted to a direction for the sale of other properties of the assessee if, for any cause whatever, the peon found it impossible to realize the tax by sale of the attached property, and, therefore, the conviction was legal.²⁴ Where the Nazir of a Court went with a party to give possession of certain land and after allowing a substantial time for the auction-purchaser to come to terms with the judgment-debtors, ordered the judgment-debtors to remove the huts that existed on the property but on their objecting on the ground that the writ was not to give delivery of possession of the house, the Nazir asked the decree-holder's men to remove the huts; it was held that in giving directions that the huts should be taken down the Nazir acted in good faith and that there was no question of private defence available to the accused judgment-debtors and their men who chased the Nazir and the decree-holder's men with lathis thereby not only committing assault but obstructing further processes of the Court and that the accused were guilty under this section.²⁵

A very curious case came before the High Court in England. Certain constables were on duty observing and timing the speed of motor cars driven along a certain road with a view to the prosecution of the drivers of such cars as should be travelling at an illegal speed. For that purpose they had measured a certain distance along the road. The accused warned the drivers of cars which were approaching the measured distance of the presence of the constables and the purpose for which they were there. There was evidence that at the time the warning was given the cars were being driven at an illegal speed, and the drivers upon receipt of the warning slackened their speed and proceeded over the measured distance at a lawful speed, whereby the constables, as the accused intended, were prevented from obtaining such evidence as would be accepted as sufficient in a police Court that the drivers of the cars were committing an offence. It was held that the accused had wilfully obstructed the constables in the execution of their duty within the meaning of the Prevention of Crimes Amendment Acts.¹ This decision has been followed in a Bombay case. The accused, a licensed motor driver, in order to evade payment of toll, drove a motor bus for six days on a side track before reaching the toll bar, and after driving on that side track for about three furlongs again took the main road. There was a checking bar further up the road but the accused did not stop the bus there to pay the toll although he was signalled to do so. The accused having been convicted under this section for obstructing a public servant in the discharge of his public functions, it was held that the accused prevented the toll contractor or his servant from collecting the dues under the provisions of the Tolls on Roads and Bridges Act, and thus obstructed him in the discharge of his duty.²

Rescuing from custody.—Where two peons of a Court arrested the accused and while they were bringing him towards the Court, he called for help and four persons came and rescued him from the custody of the peons, it was held that they were guilty of an offence under this section, and the accused, of abetting the same.³

Illegal attachments.—Where a person resisted an officer who attached a spade and a bucket, protected from attachment by s. 94 of the Local Boards Act (Mad. Act V of 1884), it was held that that circumstance did not justify the resistance. The act, however irregular or illegal it might have been, was the act of a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office, and against such an act the accused had no right of self-defence.⁴ Where the accused was prosecuted under this section for releasing certain buffaloes attached by civil Court peons under defective warrants, it was held that they were not guilty under this section as the peons were not lawfully executing the warrants.⁵ An attachment made under a writ which does not bear the seal of the Court as required by O. XXI, r. 24(2), Civil Procedure Code, is an invalid and illegal attachment. Persons rescuing the attached property are not guilty of any offence.⁶ Where a civil Court peon, in execution of an unsealed writ of attachment, attached a bullock and calf belonging to the judgment-debtor, the latter being absent at the time, and the judgment-debtor subsequently followed and obstructed the peon and others who were with him, and rescued the cattle after attacking the identifier, it was held that he was not guilty of an offence under this section.⁷ When the date fixed in a warrant of attachment has expired, the warrant is no longer in force and capable of execution, and if any person offers resistance to execution purporting to be made under the time-expired warrant, he is not guilty of this offence.⁸ Resistance by a judgment-debtor to attachment process issued for service at a place beyond the jurisdiction of the Court is not punishable under this section.⁹ Where the writ of attachment directed the officer to attach the goods belonging to the judgment-debtor and the attaching officer having found the goods in the possession of the accused proceeded to seal up the ware-house containing the goods, and was obstructed by the accused whose actual physical resistance to the officer was not more than he was justified in using in resisting an unlawful proceeding, it was held that the accused was not guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁰ Where certain goods were distrained from a provision shop and the weight, by approximation only, of the goods was entered in the inventory and the copy thereof, and the owner obstructed the removal of the goods on the ground that the goods should be actually weighed and the correct weight entered, it was held that no offence had been committed by the owner and he could not be convicted under this section.¹¹

Mere non-compliance with the procedure for effecting an attachment prescribed by High Court Rules does not vitiate a warrant of attachment, and legalise obstruction by the judgment-debtor to the officer attaching. In cases of obstruction and resistance to legal process the Court should look at the warrant of attachment and see whether the officer was doing something, which was not contained in the writ of attachment which would have justified reasonable resistance and only such reasonable resistance as was necessary for the purpose of resisting an unlawful act.¹²

No obstruction if no overt act done or physical means used.—Persuasion, addressed to a tenant, not to pay rents to a receiver in the absence of such receiver was held not to constitute an obstruction to the receiver within the meaning of this section.¹³ The taking away of a child to the vaccination depot of which no consent was given by the parent, with the use of such force as was necessary for the purpose, was held not punishable under this section.¹⁴ cart-owner refusing to give his cart on hire to a Government officer;²⁰ a person spreading a false report and thereby preventing persons from bringing their children for vaccination;²¹ a person preventing a vaccinator from taking lymph from the arm of his child;²² a person falsely informing a vaccinator that he would get no children to vaccinate in the village;²³ a person, between whom and a Municipality there was a bona fide dispute as to the ownership of a road, and who pulled up pegs and cut strings put down to mark out the road in the assertion of his right;²⁴ a person obstructing municipal servants from removing bales from a strip of land regarding which there was a bona fide dispute of ownership;²⁵ a person merely posting up placards asserting a title to property about to be auctioned by a public servant;¹ a person objecting to the search of his house, without using force or threatening language;² and a person standing by a staircase and, without any threat or obstruction at the passage, verbally objecting to a police search party going upstairs,³ were held to have committed no offence under this section.

A Magistrate, being deputed to reorganize a certain village panchayat, proposed, in obedience to orders of the Government, to include thereon a member of the depressed classes. This was resented by one of the panchas, who behaved in a very rude manner towards the Magistrate, refused to serve on the panchayat, and did his best to dissuade other people from serving on it. It was held that however reprehensible the conduct of the accused might have been, he was at liberty to refuse to serve himself and was within his rights in trying to induce others to refuse to serve, and that he could not be convicted of an offence under this section.⁴ Where a patwari refused to allow a kanungo to go through his books and to check them, it was held that it was only an act of insubordination and was not a criminal act falling within the purview of this section.⁵ Where certain goods were distrained from a provision shop and the weight, by approximation only, of the goods was entered in the inventory and the copy thereof, and the owner obstructed the removal of the goods on the ground that the goods should be actually weighed and the correct weight entered, it was held that no offence had been committed by the owner and he could not be convicted under this section.⁶

No obstruction if order or warrant under which public servant acts not legal.—A constable was sent to fetch some persons. The order to attend was not in writing. While the constable was taking two persons with him, P came up and threatened both of them and the constable with the chief constable's vengeance and in consequence the two persons refused to accompany the constable who had to go without them. P was convicted of offences under this section and s. 189. It was held that as the order did not conform to the provisions of s. 160 of the Criminal Procedure Code, P was not guilty under this section; but he was guilty of an offence under s. 506 and that there was no reason for interfering with his conviction under s. 189.⁷ Where a District Magistrate issued a warrant for the arrest and production of a witness for the purpose of giving evidence at an investigation held by the police, and in attempting to execute such warrant the police arrested the wrong person, and were assaulted in the attempt, it was held that as the District Magistrate had no authority to issue such warrant the accused were justified in their resistance and that no offence under s. 143 or this section was committed.⁸ Resistance or obstruction to the execution of an illegal warrant is not an offence under this section.⁹ A person obstructing a public servant executing a warrant of arrest which was not signed by the Magistrate but only bore his initials and the substance of which was not notified to him;¹⁰ a person obstructing an amin in the measurement of certain lands for partition, when the amin was not acting under the Collector's authority;¹¹ a person obstructing a public servant executing a warrant which did not bear a date on or before which it was to be executed;¹² a person obstructing a public servant executing a writ of attachment after the date fixed in the writ;¹³ and a person resisting a warrant which the Court issuing it had no jurisdiction to issue it,¹⁴ were held to have committed no offence under this section.

In a suit filed in a Mamlatdar's Court the plaintiff obtained a decree against the accused for possession of a certain piece of land. When the Mamlatdar proceeded to execute the decree he found that there was no land corresponding to the boundaries set forth in the plaint, and that the parties were joint owners and in joint occupation of the land in dispute. The Mamlatdar referred the matter to the Collector who ordered a surveyor to execute the decree by dividing the land in dispute and putting the decree-holder in possession of his share. The surveyor, in attempting to execute the decree, was obstructed by the accused, who was thereupon tried and convicted under this section. It was held that as the Collector had no legal authority to issue the order to the surveyor, the surveyor was not discharging a public function and the accused therefore had not committed any offence under this section.¹⁵ In execution of a decree for restitution of conjugal rights a warrant was issued directing the executing peon to seize the wife and deliver her bodily to her husband failing which to bring her under arrest before the executing Court. The peon seized the woman in execution of the warrant but he was resisted and the woman was snatched away. It was held that the warrant, the execution of which was resisted, was illegal and therefore no offence was committed under this section.¹⁶ An Income-tax Officer visited the village of the accused where he was told by the village officials that the accused kept several shops and ought to be assessed to income-tax. A dispute, thereupon, took place between them and the accused and in the course of the quarrel the latter assaulted and beat the former who, as a result, declined to render any help to the Income-tax Officer in his investigation. It was held that the action of the accused did not amount to obstructing the Income-tax Officer in the discharge of his public functions within the meaning of this section.¹⁷

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person obstructed is a public servant.

(2) That at the time of obstruction he was discharging his public functions.

(3) That the accused obstructed him in the same.

(4) That he did so voluntarily.

Proof of mala fides of the person obstructing the public servant is not necessary to sustain a conviction under this section.¹⁸

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

The offence under this section is included in the offence under s. 353, Indian Penal Code, and an accused cannot be convicted under this section in addition to s. 353.¹⁹

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some and if such assistance be demanded of him by a public servant legally competent to make such demand for the purposes of executing any process lawfully issued by a Court of Justice,³ or of preventing the commission of an offence,⁴ or of suppressing a riot,⁵ or affray,⁶ or of apprehending a person charged with or guilty of an offence, or of having escaped from lawful custody, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

Scope.—This section provides, first, in general terms, for the punishment when a person being bound by law to render assistance to a public servant in the execution of his public duty intentionally omits to assist; secondly, it provides for the punishment when the assistance is demanded for certain specified purposes.²³

Persons bound to furnish information to public servants are punished under ss. 176 and 177. Persons bound to assist public servants come within the purview of this section. In all these cases a breach of legal obligation on the part of the accused is necessary. For instance, if a person required to attend a search fail to do so without reasonable excuse, he will be guilty under this section.²⁴

1. 'Bound by law to render or furnish assistance.'—The word 'assistance' referred to in the former part of the section is ejusdem generis with the various forms of assistance specified in the latter half. The assistance must have some direct personal relation to the execution of the duty by the public officer. The word 'assistance' as used here implies that the party who assists is doing something which, in ordinary circumstances, the party assisted can do for himself.²⁵ The assistance which a private person is bound to render to a public servant in the execution of his duty, must be something definite and specific. See ss. 42, 77 and 128 of the Code of Criminal Procedure as to the assistance which a person is bound to render to a public servant. It would be a good defence (1) that there was no reasonable necessity to call upon the accused to render assistance, or (2) that the accused refused on account of some physical impossibility or lawful excuse.¹ But if the refusal to assist is contrary to any provisions of a statute then the person refusing will be liable under this section. Where a person who was called upon by a Salt Inspector to assist in a search held under s. 103 of the Code of Criminal Procedure refused to do so, it was held that he had committed an offence under this section.² Similarly, a person who refused to help a police-officer to remove an arrested person who lay down on the ground and refused to move, was held liable under this section.³ Refusal to attend and witness a search when called upon to do so in writing, under s. 103 of the Criminal Procedure Code, is an offence under this section. But refusal to sign the search list by a witness who attends the search is not an offence under this section, as it is not made penal under it.⁴

No offence if not legally bound to assist.—A person was convicted under this section for refusing, when called by a Forest Guard, to serve as one of a punch for the purpose of drawing up a punchanama with reference to certain wood alleged to have been illegally cut in a reserved forest. It was held that the conviction was illegal, as he was not legally bound to assist the Forest Guard under the Indian Forests Act (VII of 1878), s. 78.⁵ A Magistrate directed a landholder to find a clue in a case of theft within fifteen days and to assist the police. It was held that as such order was not authorized under ss. 90 and 91 of the Criminal Procedure Code (Act X of 1872), the landholder could not be convicted under this section.⁶

The accused refused to assist a police constable, who wished to bury the dead body of a man who had died of cholera leaving no relations, and threatened to punish any one who did so. It was held that as they were not bound to assist the constable they were not liable.⁷

Unreasonable demand for assistance.—Where a police-officer called upon the accused to assist him in arresting certain persons who were supposed to be dacoits and hiding in a forest tract in his district and whose whereabouts were not known and the accused declined to help him, it was held that the accused were not guilty of an offence under this section.⁸

4. 'Offence'.—Anything punishable under the Code or any special or local law (s. 40).

5. 'Riot'.—See s. 146, supra. 6. 'Affray'.—See s. 159, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person requiring assistance is a public servant.

(2) That he was then in the execution of his duties.

(3) That the accused was legally bound to render or furnish assistance to him.

(4) That the accused omitted to give assistance.

(5) That he did so intentionally.

Or prove (1), (2) and (3) as above, and further

(4) That such assistance was required (a) for the purpose of executing the process (lawfully issued) of a Court of Justice; or (b) to prevent a riot or an affray; or (c) to apprehend a person, such person having been charged with an offence or being guilty thereof, or such person having escaped from lawful custody.

(5) That such assistance was demanded of the accused by such public servant who was legally competent to make such demand.

(6) That the accused omitted to give assistance.

(7) That he omitted to do so intentionally.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.⁹

188. Whoever, knowing that,¹ by an order promulgated by a public servant² lawfully empowered to promulgate such order,³ he is directed to abstain from a certain act, or to take certain order with certain property in his possession or under his management, disobeys such direction,⁴ shall, if such disobedience causes or tends to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury, or risk of obstruction, annoyance or injury, to any persons lawfully employed,⁵ be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both ;

and if such disobedience causes or tends to cause danger to human life, health or safety, or causes or tends to cause a riot or affray, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Explanation.—It is not necessary that the offender should intend to produce harm, or contemplate his disobedience as likely to produce harm. It is sufficient that he knows of the order which he disobeys, and that his disobedience produces, or is likely to produce, harm.

ILLUSTRATION.

An order is promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such order, directing that a religious procession shall not pass down a certain street. A knowingly disobeys the order, and thereby causes danger of riot. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

COMMENT.

The authors of the Code say :—“ We have, to the best of our ability, framed laws against acts which ought to be repressed at all times and places, or at times and places which it is in our power to define. But there are acts which at one time and place are perfectly innocent, and which at another time or place are proper subjects of punishment ; nor is it always possible for the legislator to say at what time or at what place such acts ought to be punishable.

“ Thus it may happen that a religious procession which is in itself perfectly legal, and which, while it passes through many quarters of a town, is perfectly harmless, cannot without great risk of tumult and outrage be suffered to turn down a particular street inhabited by persons who hold the ceremony in abhorrence, and whose passions are excited by being forced to witness it. Again, there are many Hindoo rites which in Hindoo temples and religious assemblies the law tolerates, but which could not with propriety be exhibited in a place which English gentlemen and ladies were in the habit of frequenting for purposes of exercise. Again, at a particular season hydrophobia may be common among the dogs at a particular place, and it may be highly advisable that all people at that place should keep their dogs strictly confined. Again, there may be a particular place in a town which the people are in the habit of using as a receptacle for filth. In general this practice may do no harm, but an unhealthy season may arrive, when it may be dangerous to the health of the population, and under such circumstances it is evidently desirable that no person should be allowed to add to the nuisance. It is evident that it is utterly impossible for the legislature to mark out the route of all the religious processions in India, to specify all the public walks frequented by English ladies and gentlemen, to foresee in what months and in what places hydrophobia will be common among dogs, or when a particular dunghill may become dangerous to the health of a town. It is equally evident that it would be unjust to punish a person who cannot be proved to have acted with bad intentions for doing today what yesterday was a perfectly innocent act, or for doing in one street what it would be perfectly innocent to do in another street, without giving him some notice.

“ What we propose, therefore, is to empower the local authorities to forbid acts which these authorities consider as dangerous to the public tranquillity, health, safety or convenience, and to make it an offence in a person to do any thing which that person knows to be so forbidden, and which may endanger the public tranquillity, health, safety or convenience. It will be observed that we do not give to the local authorities the power of arbitrarily making any thing an offence; for unless the Court before which the person who disobeys the order is tried shall be of opinion that he has done something tending to endanger the public tranquillity, health, safety or convenience, he will be liable to no punishment. The effect of the order of the local authority will be merely to deprive the person who knowingly disobeys the order of the plea that he had no bad intentions. He will not be permitted to allege that if he has caused harm, or risk of harm, it was without his knowledge.

"Thus, if in a town where no order for the chaining up of dogs has been made, A suffers his dog to run about loose, A will be liable to no punishment for any mischief which the animal may do, unless it can be shown that A knew the animal to be dangerous. But if an order for confining dogs has been issued, and if A knew of that order, it will be no defence for him to allege, and even to prove, that he believed his dog to be perfectly harmless. If the Court think that A's disobedience has caused harm, or risk of harm, A will be liable to punishment. On the other hand, if the Court think that there was no danger, and that the local order was a foolish one, A will not be liable to punishment.

"We see some objections to the way in which we have framed this part of the law; but we are unable to frame it better. On the one hand, it is, as we have shown, absolutely necessary to have some local rules which shall not require the sanction of the legislature. On the other hand, we are sensible that there is the greatest reason to apprehend much petty tyranny and vexation from such rules; and this although the framers of those rules may be very excellent and able men. There is scarcely any disposition in a ruler more prejudicial to the happiness of the people than a meddling disposition. Yet, experience shows us that it is a disposition which is often found in company with the best intentions, with great activity and energy, and with a sincere regard for the interest of the community. A public servant of more than ordinary zeal and industry, unless he have very much more than ordinary judgment, is the very man who is likely to harass the people under his care with needless restrictions. We have, therefore, thought it necessary to provide that no person should be punished merely for disobeying a local order, unless it be made to appear that the disobedience has been attended with evil, or risk of evil. Thus no person will be punished for disobeying an idle and vexatious order."¹⁰

Ingredients.—The section requires—

1. That there must be an order promulgated by a public servant.
2. That the public servant must have been lawfully empowered to promulgate such order.
3. That a person having knowledge of such order and directed by such order (a) to abstain from a certain act, or (b) to take certain order with certain property in his possession or under his management, has disobeyed such direction.
4. That such disobedience causes or tends to cause (i) obstruction, annoyance, or injury, or risk of it, to any person lawfully employed, or (ii) danger to human life, health or safety, or (iii) a riot or affray.¹¹

1. 'Whoever, knowing that'.—There must be evidence that the accused had knowledge of the order with the disobedience of which he is charged.¹² The question of knowledge must generally be a matter of inference and an inference of knowledge can be made from circumstances where they are such as to entitle a Court to make the inference.¹³

2. 'Order promulgated by a public servant'.—Where an order has been duly made and promulgated, although not strictly in accordance with the terms of the law, and has been brought to the actual knowledge of the person sought to be affected by it, that is sufficient to bring the case under the section.¹⁴ It is necessary that the order should be in writing and duly promulgated and directed to the accused.¹⁵ But a general order also is quite sufficient.¹⁶ Mere proof of a general notification promulgating the order does not satisfy the requirements of this section. It is open to the Magistrate, in determining the question of such knowledge, to take into consideration the facts and circumstances of the case including the fact that the accused lived at a place where the order was duly promulgated.¹⁷

If an order is intended to have a temporary operation only, and has expired by efflux of time, and has not been again promulgated, no conviction can be had for disobedience to it.¹⁸ Similarly, disobedience to an invalid order is not punishable.¹⁹

An order under s. 267 of the Indian Succession Act;²⁰ ss. 133, 136 and 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure;²¹ s. 473 of the City of Bombay Municipal Act,²² etc. are orders under this section.

Orders contemplated by this section are orders made by public functionaries in the public interest.²³

'Public servant.'—The section only applies when the order has been issued by a public servant.²⁴ A Receiver appointed under the Land Registration Act (Beng. Act VII of 1876, s. 56) is not such a public servant.²⁵

See s. 21 as to the meaning of 'public servant.'

3. 'Lawfully empowered to promulgate such order.'—If the public servant in question is not lawfully empowered to promulgate the order no conviction can stand.¹ The order must be a proper order and not merely a notice.² If the order is both in substance and in its manner of publication illegal, as being beyond the powers conferred by law, the accused will not be liable.³

4. 'Directed to abstain from a certain act, or to take certain order with certain property in his possession, etc.'—The section applies where a person 'knowing' that an order has been promulgated by proper authorities to do or not to do certain acts disobeys such order.⁴

5. 'Such disobedience causes or tends to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury,.....etc.'—Mere disobedience of an order does not constitute an offence in itself, it must be shown that the disobedience has or tends to a certain consequence.⁵ In *Empress v. Habibullah*⁶ Mahmood, J., observed: "It is necessary to establish that the disobedience 'causes, or tends to cause, obstruction, annoyance, or injury to any person lawfully employed'; and to make the offence graver, it must be established that 'such disobedience causes, or tends to cause, danger to human life, health, or safety; or causes, or tends to cause, a riot or affray'; and it is clear that if none of these conditions are satisfied the conviction is illegal, and must be set aside. Now, in the first place, it seems clear to me that the 'obstruction, annoyance, or injury on the one hand, and the 'danger to human life, health, or safety' on the other hand, are intended by the section to be applicable to cases in which the injurious results therein contemplated arise in the ordinary course of lawful employment to persons who, in the exercise of their rights as ordinary citizens, may incur such evil consequences on account of any act or omission of the accused, which act or omission occurs in disobedience of a lawful order. In the next place, I am of the opinion that the section has no application to cases in which a person simply neglects his property, and by allowing a wall or a gate-way to remain in a dilapidated condition, renders theft or other crime more easy of commission than would otherwise be the case. The law does not contemplate that the physical barrier of a wall or a gate is the means of restraining persons from crime, and no order of this nature can be made on the mere ground of any such apprehension". In this case the accused were in possession of an inn where travellers put up. The Magistrate passed an order directing them to repair the gate of the inn within a month as it was apprehended that travellers' property would otherwise be stolen. The repairs required by the order were not made till after the expiry of the month and the accused were therefore convicted under this section. It was held that the conviction was wrong.⁷ A conviction in the absence of evidence as to the likely result of the disobedience of an order is bad in law.⁸ Thus disobedience to an order under s. 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code, prohibiting a person from holding a market on certain specified days was held not to be punishable in the absence of evidence showing that the disobedience was likely to lead to a breach of the peace.⁹ The Explanation to the section says that it is not necessary that the offender should intend to produce harm, or contemplate his disobedience as likely to produce harm. It is sufficient that he knows of the order which he disobeys, and that his disobedience produces or is likely to produce harm.¹⁰ The accused were directed not to make any disturbance over a certain person's rights of a ferry and thereafter they being found plying another ferry at the site in question but not causing any disturbance were ordered to be prosecuted under this section. It was held that the order for prosecution was infructuous.¹¹ Where proclamation and attachment were issued against an absconder attaching some undivided land of the joint family to which the absconder belonged, and one of the other members of the family cultivated the lands in spite of the order, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section.¹² But if the act of disobedience hastened to cause annoyance it is sufficient under this section. Objectionable language near a liquor shop, such as "if you drink, you will be drinking the blood of your children", speaks for itself and no more evidence than the words used is required.¹³ The accused sold drinks in his shop during a festival day in contravention of an order promulgated by the District Magistrate and he was convicted under this section. It was held that the conviction was illegal as there was no question or proof of causing or tending to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury, to any one and as it does not follow as a matter of course that selling drinks will lead to riots or disturbance.¹⁴ Mere refusal to disperse when ordered to do so under s. 144, Criminal Procedure Code, does not amount to an offence under this section.¹⁵

Section not applicable to orders made in civil suits.—The section applies to orders made by public functionaries for public purposes and not to an order made in a civil suit between party and party.¹⁶ The operation of the section is limited to the promulgation by public servants of orders relating to safety, health, or convenience of the public. Thus, disobedience to an order issued under O. XXI, r. 46, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, is not punishable under this section.¹⁷ The proper remedy for disobedience to an order of injunction passed by a civil Court is a committal for contempt.¹⁸

Orders issued under ss. 69 and 70 of the Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885) are not of a civil nature as the primary purpose of orders made under s. 69 is to prevent breaches of the peace. Disobedience to such orders is punishable under this section.¹⁹ Disobedience to an order of summary ejectment issued under s. 219 of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act (II of 1917) is punishable likewise on the ground that it is an order made by a public functionary for a public purpose.²⁰

CASES.

Valid orders.—An order issued by a Magistrate prohibiting a zemindar from holding a new market on his estate close to an old-established one belonging to a neighbouring zemindar, on the ground that it had caused unlawful assemblies and raised apprehension of a breach of the peace;²¹ an order to the priests of a temple, much frequented by pilgrims, to widen and heighten the doorway so as to obviate the dangers arising from overcrowding, and improve the ventilation;²² an order prohibiting a person from plying a boat for hire at or in the immediate vicinity of a public ferry;²³ an order commanding an assembly of five or more persons to disperse;²⁴ an order directing rival owners of two markets not to hold them on certain days, in order to prevent any likelihood of a breach of the peace;²⁵ and an order not to slaughter cows or bullocks on particular days,¹ are held to be valid orders under this section.

An order was issued by a Magistrate prohibiting shouting against drink near liquor shops, and a person shouted from the verandah of a private house abutting on a public place, it was held that he had disobeyed the order, for if a man standing on a private place adjoining a public road shouted into the road words deliberately meant for persons using that road he was as much shouting in a public place as if he stood on the road itself and shouted.²

Invalid orders.—An order issued by a Magistrate, warning owners of cattle to take proper care of them;³ an order preventing a house-holder from building a wall to his own house, because it might result in a breach of the peace;⁴ an order to remove the banks of a tank in a dry river because they obstructed the current in rainy season;⁵ an order to cut down trees because they impeded ventilation;⁶ a verbal order under s. 187, Criminal Procedure Code;⁷ an order under s. 144, Criminal Procedure Code, prohibiting a person from collecting rents from tenants;⁸ a general order under s. 144, Criminal Procedure Code, restraining the holding of a hat or market;⁹ a notice under Mad. Act V of 1884 calling upon a person to remove certain encroachments on a public road;¹⁰ an order directing that all music should cease when any procession is passing a certain place of worship;¹¹ an order not to place stake nets in a river;¹² an order issued by a revenue officer directing certain persons to pay their assessment to a specified individual;¹³ a notice issued under s. 98 (2) of the Madras Local Boards Act (V of 1884) as amended by Act VI of 1900;¹⁴ a permit to cut and transport timber issued under ss. 26 and 35 of the Forest Act;¹⁵ an order under s. 146 of the Criminal Procedure Code;¹⁶ an order under s. 147, Criminal Procedure Code, directing a person to remove a fence so as to allow of the use of an alleged right of way;¹⁷ an order prohibiting the use of public roads between 9 p.m. and sunrise;¹⁸ an order which declared that, as between parties to a contention, certain land in dispute did not belong to the public;¹⁹ an order forbidding the slaughter of cattle or sale of meat within a radius of three miles of a licensed slaughter-house;²⁰ an order directing a landowner to find out a clue in a case of theft within fifteen days;²¹ an order forbidding persons to enter a railway station except for bona fide purposes of travelling;²² and an order directing a station-master to detain certain logs suspected to be stolen property,²³ are held to be not valid orders under this section.

Order should be directed to accused.—Where the accused was convicted of disobeying an order posted at a certain place by a Magistrate prohibiting people from burying and burning corpses there, it was held that the order, not having been served individually upon the accused, the conviction was illegal.²⁴ The proprietor of a theatre, not in actual possession or management of the theatre at a time when a lawful order promulgated by a public servant was disobeyed, was held to have committed no offence under this section.²⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the promulgation of the order.*

(2) That it was promulgated by a public servant.

(3) That such public servant was lawfully empowered to promulgate the same.¹

(4) That such order directed the accused to abstain from a certain act, or to take certain order, etc.

(5) That the accused knew of such direction to him.²

(6) That he disobeyed such direction.

(7) That such disobedience caused, or tended to cause, obstruction, annoyance or injury, or risk of the same to a person lawfully employed; or that such disobedience caused, or tended to cause, danger to human life, health, or safety; or that such disobedience caused, or tended to cause, a riot or an affray.³

Where an executive officer makes an order or issues a notification it is not within the province of judicial authority to question the propriety or legality of such order or notification, until an attempt is made to enforce the exaction of a penalty against a person committing a breach of such order or notification. It then becomes the duty of the judicial authority to consider whether the order is properly made or not.⁴ A Magistrate is not competent to try and convict a person under this section of disobedience to an order issued by himself as Magistrate under s. 144, Criminal Procedure Code.⁵

Order under appeal.—A Magistrate is not warranted in convicting and imprisoning a person for disobeying an order the legality of which is then under the consideration of an appellate Court.⁶

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate, is required.⁷ A prosecution launched without such complaint is illegal and nugatory.⁸ A prosecution under this section should not be launched unless all the elements necessary for a conviction are present.⁹ The complaint for an alleged disobedience of an order under s. 144, Criminal Procedure Code, must show that the disobedience caused, or tended to cause, obstruction, annoyance or injury or a riot. Whether a complaint in writing is necessary where an order is promulgated by Government is open to question. Under the old s. 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code, it was held that where the order was not promulgated by any public servant but by Government, no sanction was required as a condition precedent to prosecution for disobeying the order.¹⁰

It is not possible to say that, merely by making the class of offence contemplated by this section cognizable and non-bailable, the necessity of having a complaint in such a case is dispensed with.¹¹

No appeal lies against the refusal of a public servant to file a complaint.¹²

Punishment.—Rigorous imprisonment can only be inflicted if the case comes within the latter part of the section.¹³

189. Whoever holds out any threat of injury¹ to any public servant,² or to any person in whom he believes that public servant to be interested, for the purpose of inducing that public servant to do any act, or to forbear or delay to do any act, connected with the exercise of the public functions of such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Threat of injury to public servant.

COMMENT.

Section 503 defines criminal intimidation. That section is general in its character: whereas this section deals with criminal intimidation of a public servant.

Under this section there must be “a threat of injury”, to either the public servant or to any one in whom he (the accused) believes that public servant to be interested”. “What the section deals with are menaces which would have a tendency to induce the public servant to alter his action because of some possible injury to himself or to some one in whom the accused believes he has an interest. It is not the commission of the offence against the public order so much as the threat and corresponding apprehension of personal injury which are supposed to be inducements to the public servant to alter his course. If a man went to a Magistrate in his Court or to a public office at the thana and said, ‘Unless you stop the Hindu procession I will commit a theft’ or ‘I will commit a riot’, the mere fact that such offences often result in injury to persons, would not, I think, bring the language within the section 189. If however instead of merely stating an intention to commit the offence, he added words threatening personal injury, such as 'Unless you stop the Hindu procession I will commit theft of your property' or 'I will cause a riot and attack you or your police force', the words of the section would be satisfied".¹⁴ Where the accused more than once, and in a loud tone, said to the Magistrate and other police-officers that he and others would obstruct the carrying of a Hindu God along the road, even though a riot and bloodshed might take place, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁵ It is essential to prove the words used by the accused in threatening the public servant in order to enable the Court to ascertain whether in fact a threat of injury to the public servant was really made by the accused.¹⁶ Where the witnesses in a case differed as to the exact words used by the accused in threatening the public servant, though they agreed as to the general effect of those words, it was held that it was most material that those words should be before the Court to enable it to ascertain whether in fact a threat of injury to the public servant was really made by the accused.¹⁷

Mere empty threats, which are often effusions of passion unattended with any formal intention of wrong, should be distinguished from threats really calculated to cause the person to whom they are held out to be in fear of the injury threatened.¹⁸ Where the endorsement on a summons was to the effect that after tender of the summons to the witness, the accused, the son of the witness, and the owner of the house came up, abused the process-server and asked him to get out of the house, and that the witness immediately after received the summons and batta and signed his name, it was held that no offence was committed.¹⁹ Where a person arrested in execution of a decree refused to follow the peon who arrested him, and threatened to use violence, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.²⁰

1. 'Injury'.—See s. 44, supra. "Injury" implies an illegal harm and the mere threat to bring a legal complaint either before a Court or before a public servant's superior is no "injury". A police constable stopped a motor car travelling at night without lights. During an altercation which took place between the driver and the constable the accused came up and told the driver to bring a complaint against the constable, in which he himself would be pleased to give evidence on behalf of the driver. It was held that the accused was not guilty of an offence under this section.²¹

2. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused held out the threat.

(2) That such threat was of injury.

(3) That the person threatened was a public servant; or some person in whom the accused believed such public servant was interested.

(4) That the purpose for which such threat was held out was to induce such public servant to do, or to forbear, or delay to do any act, connected with the exercise of his public functions.²²

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, held out a threat of injury to a public servant, to wit——, [or to——in whom you believed that a public servant, to wit——, was interested] for the purpose of inducing that public servant to do an act, to wit——, [or to forbear or delay to do——], connected with the exercise of the public functions of such public servant and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 189 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance. And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

Punishment.—A Court, in passing sentence, should inflict such sentence as the gravity or otherwise of the crime of which the accused has been convicted warrants and merits, irrespective of whether the sentence inflicted will involve a right of appeal or not, even although the accused may pray for an appealable sentence.²³

190. Whoever holds out any threat¹ of injury² to any person for the purpose of inducing that person to refrain or desist from making a legal application for protection against any injury to any public servant³ legally empowered as such to give such protection, or to cause such protection to be given, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Threat of injury to induce person to refrain from applying for protection to public servant.

COMMENT.

This section provides for the punishment of a person holding out a threat of injury to any person to prevent him seeking protection from a public servant empowered as such to give him protection.²⁴

The object of this section is to prevent persons from terrorising others with a view to induce them to desist from seeking the protection of public servants for any injury. Where a clergyman knowing that a civil suit was pending against a person for the possession of certain church property, excommunicated him for withholding it, it was held that the clergyman had committed an offence under this section.²⁵

1. 'Threat.'—See s. 189, supra.

2. 'Injury.'—See s. 44, supra. A threat of institution of a civil suit for a mere declaration of right against any person who was objecting to that right was held to be not harm illegally caused to that person in body, mind, reputation or property.¹

3. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused held out the threat.

(2) That such threat was of an injury.

(3) That the purpose for which such threat was held out was to induce the person threatened to refrain or desist from making a legal application for protection against some injury.

(5) That such public servant was legally empowered, as such, to give the protection, or to cause the same to be given.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the _____ day of _____, at _____, held out a threat of injury, to wit _____, to _____, for the purpose of inducing him to refrain or desist from making a legal application for protection against such injury to a public servant legally empowered to give such protection (or to cause such protection to be given), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 190 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

CHAPTER XI.

OF FALSE EVIDENCE AND OFFENCES AGAINST PUBLIC JUSTICE.

THE Code treats the giving and the fabricating of false evidence in exactly the same way, and marks the grades of those offences on the principle that the law ought to make a distinction between the kind of false evidence which produces great evils and the kind of false evidence which produces comparatively slight evils. As plaints and written statements are verified by the civil suitors who present them, the Code renders punishable the deliberate assertions of falsehoods in pleadings.¹

191. Whoever being legally bound by an oath or by an express provision of law to state the truth, or being bound by law to make a déclaration upon any subject,² makes any statement which is false,³ and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, is said to give false evidence.

Explanation 1.—A statement is within the meaning of this section, whether it is made verbally or otherwise.

Explanation 2.—A false statement as to the belief of the person attesting is within the meaning of this section, and a person may be guilty of giving false evidence by stating that he believes a thing which he does not believe, as well as by stating that he knows a thing which he does not know.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A, in support of a just claim which B has against Z for one thousand rupees, falsely swears on a trial that he heard Z admit the justice of B's claim. A has given false evidence.

(b) A, being bound by an oath to state the truth, states that he believes a certain signature to be the handwriting of Z, when he does not believe it to be the handwriting of Z. Here A states that which he knows to be false, and therefore gives false evidence.

(c) A, knowing the general character of Z's handwriting, states that he believes a certain signature to be the handwriting of Z; A in good faith believing it to be so. Here A's statement is merely as to his belief, and is true as to his belief, and therefore, although the signature may not be the handwriting of Z, A has not given false evidence.

(d) A, being bound by an oath to state the truth, states that he knows that Z was at a particular place on a particular day, not knowing anything upon the subject. A gives false evidence whether Z was at that place on the day named or not.

(e) A, an interpreter or translator, gives or certifies as a true interpretation or translation of a statement or document, which he is bound by oath to interpret or translate truly, that which is not and which he does not believe to be a true interpretation or translation. A has given false evidence.

COMMENT.

The offence of giving false evidence is known as 'perjury' under the English law.

Scope.—The words of this section are very general, and do not contain any limitation that the false statement made shall have any bearing upon the matter in issue. It is sufficient if the false evidence is intentionally given, that is to say, if the person making the statement makes it advisedly, knowing it to be false, and with the intention of deceiving the Court, and of leading it to be supposed that that which he states is true.²

English law.—According to common law a statement on oath or affirmation, to amount to perjury, must be—(1) taken in a judicial proceeding; (2) taken before a competent tribunal; (3) material to the question; (4) false; (5) known by the witness to be false or not known to be true. The law relating to perjury is consolidated by 1 & 2 Geo. V, c. 6.

Difference between English and Indian law.—(1) According to common law the false statement must have reference to some judicial proceeding; and the false evidence must be given before a competent tribunal. In the Code this distinction only exists in reference to the degree of punishment imposed.³

(2) According to common law perjury must be proved by two witnesses, or by one witness with proof of other material and relevant facts substantially confirming his testimony. Under the Penal Code no particular number of witnesses in any case is required to prove any fact.

(3) The common law requires that the matter sworn to must be material to the cause depending in the Court. According to the Penal Code it is not necessary that the statement should be material, but that would be considered in awarding punishment.⁴

(4) In England, an oath, or an affirmation rendered equivalent to it by law, is an essential element of the offence. It is immaterial whether the fact which is sworn to is in itself true or false. In India, an oath is merely one of the forms by which a party may be bound to speak the truth. Even if an oath were improperly administered by an incompetent person, still the offence would be committed, if the party giving the false evidence were bound by an 'express provision of law to state the truth.'

Ingredients.—The offence under this section involves three ingredients :—

1. A person must be legally bound (a) by an oath, or any express provision of law, to state the truth, or (b) to make a declaration upon any subject;
2. He must make a false statement; and
3. He must know or believe it to be false, or must not believe it to be true.

1. 'Legally bound by an oath or by an express provision of law to state the truth...or...to make a declaration upon any subject'.—It is necessary that the accused should be legally bound by an oath before a competent authority. If the Court has no authority to administer an oath to a witness the proceeding will be coram non jure and a prosecution for false evidence will not stand.⁵ Section 4 of the Indian Oaths Act (X of 1873) specifies the Courts and persons who have authority to administer oaths and affirmations. Section 5 enumerates the persons by whom oaths or affirmations must be made.

'By an oath.'—An oath or solemn affirmation is not a sine qua non to the offence of giving false evidence.⁶ The offence may be committed although the person giving evidence has neither been sworn nor affirmed.⁷ By s. 14 of the Oaths Act⁸ every person giving evidence on any subject, before any Court, is bound to state the truth.

The idea of the oath, namely, that the person swearing renounces the mercy and imprecates the vengeance of Heaven if he do not speak the truth, the idea of binding the conscience of the witness, which still prevails in England, and which in former time led to the swearing of Hindus on the Tulsi and Ganges water, and of Mahomedans on the Koran, finds no place in the Oaths Act. The superstitious or religious sanction has been disregarded and the legal sanction alone is relied upon. See s. 51, supra, for the definition of 'oath.'

Oath under foreign law.—Perjury cannot be assigned on a foreign affidavit taken before a person not authorized to administer an oath by English law.⁹ There is no provision in the Penal Code which constitutes it an offence to give false evidence before a Court in a Native State where the oath is not administered under the provisions of law in force in British India, but under the law of that State in relation to proceedings before that Court.¹⁰

Want of jurisdiction.—If the Court administering the oath is acting beyond its jurisdiction a conviction will not be sustained.¹¹ The test of jurisdiction is whether or not the Court had power to enter upon the inquiry.¹² If the Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the proceedings in the course of which a false statement is made, no offence is committed.¹³

A pleader giving a false explanation on solemn affirmation, when asked to explain his conduct under the Legal Practitioners' Act;¹⁴ an heir of an employee in the Telegraph Department supporting his claim before the District Judge by false witnesses, under an oath, the Judge having no authority to administer it;¹⁵ a Native Christian giving false evidence, though solemnly affirmed under Act V of 1840, the Act not being applicable to him, but only to Hindus and Mahomedans;¹⁶ a person making a false statement before a person purporting to act under the Registration Act but not legally authorized to do so;¹⁷ a person making a false statement in an application for a new trial;¹⁸ or in a verified petition presented under s. 19 of the Income-tax Act (IX of 1869) to a Tahsildar, who was not an officer competent to receive such a petition;¹⁹ and a person making false accounts with the intention of producing them before a Forest Officer not empowered by law to hold an investigation,²⁰ were held to have committed no offence under this section.

Criminal Procedure Code, s. 164.—A Magistrate acting under this section has power to administer an oath, and a charge of perjury can be framed with regard to statements made before him on oath when he is so acting.²¹

'An express provision of law.'—Under this clause sanction of an oath is not necessary, but there must be a specific provision of law compelling a person to state the truth. It must be proved that the false statement was made under the sanction of law.²² Where the accused is not bound by an express provision of law to state the truth he cannot be charged with giving false evidence. Thus, where a person after acquittal was examined on oath to enable the Court to take cognizance of an offence under s. 190 (c), Criminal Procedure Code, it was held that though the Magistrate might examine the person for that purpose, yet he could not examine him on oath under the Oaths Act, as he was not a witness in any case at the time, and that he was not legally bound to state the truth.²³ The law does not require a petition for substitution of parties to be verified, and, therefore, the person who presents to a

Court a verified petition for substitution containing a false statement of the death of the defendant, is not guilty of giving false evidence.²⁴ Intentional omission to make statements required by s. 235 of the Code of Civil Procedure amounts to an offence under s. 193.²⁵

Criminal Procedure Code, s. 161.—Under s. 161, cl. (2), of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, which reverts to the language of the Code of 1872, a person is no longer bound by law to tell the truth when questioned by a police-officer, and he will not be liable to be prosecuted for giving false evidence.¹ The Code of 1882 contained the word 'truly' after the word 'question' in this clause, but this word has been omitted in the present Code.²

A statement made to an investigating police-officer under s. 161 and recorded by him under the provisions of s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code cannot be made the foundation of an order for prosecution under s. 193 of the Penal Code of the person making it.³ But it is submitted that a person making such a statement may come within s. 203 of the Penal Code.

'Declaration upon any subject.'—In certain cases the law requires a declaration from a person of verification in a pleading—and if such declaration is made falsely it will come under this clause. The words "any subject" denote that the declaration must be in connection with a subject regarding which it was to be made. If a judgment-creditor knowing that something has been paid on his decree verifies an execution application for the full amount, he intentionally declares that to be true which he knows to be false and has committed an offence under s. 193. It is immaterial whether the accused does or does not intend to defraud the judgment-debtor, for the offence is one against public justice and it is with a view to secure more orderly administration of justice that the law makes penal the deliberate assertions of falsehood in pleadings.⁴ A person falsely verifying his plaint⁵ or written statement⁶ is guilty of giving false evidence.

Where a person swore an affidavit all the paragraphs of which he certified on "personal knowledge and belief" there being no specification as to which of the paragraphs were based on personal knowledge and which on belief. It was held that it was open to the person to contend that the mischievous paragraphs in the affidavit were based not on his personal knowledge, but on belief and he had good grounds to entertain a belief that they were true and consequently it could not be held that the person made deliberately false statements when he swore the affidavit.⁷

2. 'Makes any statement which is false.'—It is not necessary that the false evidence should be material to the case in which it is given so long as it was made by a person who was bound by an oath to state the truth.⁸ The framers of the Code "used the word 'material', where it was intended to be an essential of the offence, and advisedly omitted it when such was not their intention... I do not say that the question of materiality may not be matter for the consideration of the jury. For the giving of false evidence, to come within section 193, must be an intentional giving; and in deciding whether or not it was intentional, the jury would have to consider whether or not the subject-matter of the statement were material to the result of the proceeding, inasmuch as if that subject-matter were wholly immaterial, they might well attribute the statement to indifference or carelessness on the part of the prisoner."⁹ Where the act giving rise to the indictment occurs out of Court then materiality is made essential to the offence, and must accordingly be averred in the indictment, e.g., ss. 197, 198, 199 and 200. If the act occurs in the face of the Court, then materiality is not made essential, and need not therefore be averred. Cases may arise in which materiality may not be essential to the offence, but it must be taken into consideration in arriving at the intention with which the false statement was made.¹⁰

'Which is false.'—It must be shown that the statement said to have been false, could not but be false. It is not sufficient to show that the probabilities are that the statement was false.¹¹ The accused stated on oath that he wrote a certain document. Another person swore that he and not the accused had written the document. The handwriting expert gave his opinion that the handwriting on the document was not similar to the acknowledged handwriting of the accused and the trial Court after comparing the various handwritings had come to the conclusion that the handwriting on the document resembled that of the other person and not of the accused. It was held that a conviction under s. 198 could not stand.¹² Where the accused was prosecuted for having falsely stated in a civil suit that certain promissory notes which had been executed by him were without consideration, it was held that the rule of law enacted by s. 118 of the Negotiable Instruments Act and creating a presumption that a promissory note was for consideration would not necessarily apply to a criminal trial, and that it was necessary for the prosecution to prove that the promissory notes were for consideration, and not for the accused to prove the contrary.¹³ Where, in a suit based upon a promissory note and a receipt, the accused in the written statement filed and verified by him denied execution of the promissory note and receipt and also denied having owed any sum at all, and it was found that the promissory note and receipt were genuine, it was held that the accused could be rightly convicted of giving false evidence, if the denial was also to his knowledge.¹⁴

Direct proof of the falsity of the statement on which the perjury is assigned is essential. But, as legitimate evidence for this purpose, the law makes no distinction between the testimony of a witness directly falsifying such statement and the contradictory statement of the person charged, although not made on oath. Such a statement, when satisfactorily proved, is quite as good evidence in proof of the charge as the criminatory statement of a person charged with any other offence and on precisely the same ground,—that it is an admission of the accused person inconsistent with his innocence.¹⁵

See the heading 'Nature of proof' in the Commentary on s. 198.

3. 'Which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true.'—The false evidence must be intentionally false to the knowledge or belief of the person giving it.¹⁶ Intention is an essential ingredient in the constitution of this offence. The matter sworn to must be either false in fact, or, if true, the accused must not have known it to be so.¹⁷ A man may be guilty of this offence if he swear that he believes or thinks a fact to be true when it is not.¹⁸ The false statement for which the accused is charged must be literally false. If the statement of fact is literally true but, owing to suppression of certain other facts, leads to a wrong inference, the accused cannot be convicted.¹⁹

It is a false statement made under a verification that constitutes an offence and not a verification on oath or by solemn affirmation.²⁰

'Does not believe to be true.'—The making of a false statement, without knowledge as to whether the subject-matter of the statement is false or not, is legally a giving of false evidence.²¹ Where a man swears to a particular fact without knowing at the time whether the fact be true or false, it is as much a perjury as if he knew the fact to be false, and equally indictable.²² But a man cannot be convicted of perjury for having acted rashly and credulously and having failed to make reasonable inquiry with regard to the facts alleged by him to be true. It must be found that he made some statement which he knew or believed to be false or which he did not believe to be true.²³ Where an affidavit prepared for a person and read out to him while he is drunk is signed by him, its contents cannot be said to have been properly understood by him and he cannot be prosecuted for perjury for giving evidence contrary to the allegations in the affidavit.²⁴

False verification of pleadings.—False verification of a plaint would be an offence under this section.²⁵ A person filing a written statement in a suit is bound by law to state the truth and if he makes a statement which is false to his knowledge or belief, or which he believes not to be true, he is guilty of giving false evidence.¹ A mere assertion in a pleading contrary to fact, but merely made for the purpose of putting a plaintiff to proof of his case, cannot be made the subject of a prosecution in a criminal Court. But a litigant in making allegations as to material and substantial facts which go to support his claim as a plaintiff, on the one hand, or to meet a claim against him as a defendant on the other, is bound to truly state them, and if he does not do so, and if it can be shown that he has intentionally asserted things which are false to his knowledge, he is within the scope of this section. The very essence of crimes of this kind is not how they may injure this or that party to the litigation, but how they may deceive and mislead the Courts, and thus produce the most mischievous consequences to the administration of civil and criminal justice.² A written statement being a pleading it is competent to the defendants to a suit to raise such pleas in their written statements as they think fit or to abstain from raising things which appear to the defendants not to be of advantage to them.³

Verifying application not requiring verification.—The verification of an application, in which the applicant makes a false statement, does not subject him to punishment for this offence, if such application does not require verification.⁴

Criminating statement is no justification.—When a party makes a false statement while legally bound by solemn affirmation, the fact that the statement was one tending to criminate himself will not justify his acquittal on a charge of giving false evidence.⁵

Illegality of trial does not purge perjury.—The fact that the trial in which false evidence is given is to be commenced de novo owing to irregularity does not exonerate the person giving false evidence in that trial from the obligation to speak the truth, and he is liable for giving false evidence.⁶ But in a Bombay case the proceedings in the trial at which false evidence was given were subsequently annulled in consequence of the sanction for the prosecution being insufficient and the High Court held that the conviction of the accused must be reversed as the false statement was not made in a stage of a judicial proceeding.⁷

Liability of accused for fabricating false evidence.—The Criminal Procedure Code provides that the accused shall not render himself liable to punishment by refusing to answer questions put by the Court or by giving false answers to them.⁸ It has been pointed out by the Calcutta High Court that this section applies to an act done by an offender to screen himself from punishment.⁹ The Court dissented from the view taken by the Allahābad High Court that an accused person cannot be charged either with giving or fabricating false evidence with the sole object of diverting suspicion from himself and concealing his guilt in regard to a crime with which he is charged.¹⁰ The

Allahabad view has also not been followed by the Bombay High Court.¹¹ Subsequently the Allahabad High Court has held that s. 192 applies to an accused person who fabricates false evidence in order to defend himself, and that there is no warrant for the conclusion that there is an absolute protection or privilege in favour of an accused person who can escape from the penalty imposed by s. 193 by reason of being an accused person.¹²

Abetment.—There can be no offence of abetment of giving false evidence unless the person charged with abetment intended, not only that the statement should be made, but that the statement should be made falsely.¹³

Where an accused person asked a witness to suppress certain facts in giving his evidence against him (accused), it was held that he was guilty of abetment of giving false evidence in a stage of a judicial proceeding.¹⁴ Similarly, where a person instigated the complainant and witness in a case to make statements which he himself knew to be false, he was held guilty under ss. 109 and 193.¹⁵ Where C falsely represented himself to be U, and the writer of a document signed by U and T, knowing that C was not U, and had not written such document, adduced C as U and as the writer of that document, it was held that T was guilty of abetment of giving false evidence.¹⁶

CASES.

False statements.—A person making a false statement before a Police Patel acting under s. 13 of the Village Police Act (Bom. Act VIII of 1867);¹⁷ before a Sub-Registrar;¹⁸ and before a Registrar of Deeds, even though no oath or affirmation be administered to him;¹⁹ a witness falsely deposing in another's name;²⁰ a person in an application for execution of a decree intentionally omitting to state an adjustment between the parties after decree, whether such adjustment has or has not been previously certified to the Court;²¹ a person making false statements in an application for mutation of names under s. 42 of the Bengal Land Registration Act (Beng. VII of 1876);²² an official making a false return of the service of summons;²³ a false return to a warrant of sale;²⁴ and a person making a false statement on oath for getting an adjournment from a Court that his father was ill and had not come to Court when as a matter of fact his father had come to Court,²⁵ were held guilty of giving false evidence.

False statement in application or affidavit of accused.—The Allahabad High Court has held that a person seeking by an application in revision to get rid of a conviction standing against him is incapable of tendering his own affidavit in support of such application and, consequently, if he did tender such an affidavit, he could not be prosecuted for false statements which might be contained therein.¹ It has similarly held that where an accused person applies for the transfer of the case pending against him to some other Court, supporting his application by an affidavit, he cannot, or at least ought not to, be prosecuted under s. 193 in respect of statements made therein.² The Lahore High Court has dissented from this view. It has held that an application for transfer is not a part of the defence of an accused person and statements made by an accused in an affidavit in support of an application for transfer do not enjoy the immunity conferred by s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code upon answers to questions put to the accused by the Court.³ Further, it has held that there is no law which confers upon an accused person immunity from prosecution in respect of a false statement in an affidavit tendered by him in support of his application for transfer; and that such statement can be the subject matter of a charge for perjury.⁴ The Chief Court of Oudh has taken the same view as the Lahore High Court.⁵

False balance-sheet.—The making of a false balance sheet is not an offence within this section but s. 418.⁶ It is more appropriately punishable under s. 282 of the Indian Companies Act (VII of 1913).⁷

False darkhast.—The signing and verifying of a darkhast containing false statements is an offence under this section, and it makes no difference that at the time when the signature and verification were appended the darkhast was blank.⁸

False kabinnama.—The alleged fabrication of a kabinnama falsely reciting a valid marriage and a promise of a dower to the bride does not attract s. 193 when there is no judicial proceeding, pending or contemplated.⁹

Evidence under illegal pardon.—Evidence of an accused person illegally pardoned cannot be used against him, or subject him to a prosecution for giving false evidence.¹⁰

Irregular trial.—H, a police constable, procured a warrant to be illegally issued, without a written information or oath, for the arrest of S, upon a charge of "assaulting and obstructing him, H, in the discharge of his duty". Upon such warrant S was arrested and brought before Justices, and was, without objection, tried by them and convicted. H was afterwards indicted for perjury committed on the said trial of S, and convicted. It was held that H was rightly convicted, notwithstanding that there was neither written information, nor oath, to justify the issue of the warrant.¹¹

192. Whoever causes any circumstance to exist or makes any false entry in any book or record, or makes any document containing a false statement,¹ intending that such circumstance, false entry or false statement may appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding, or in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant² as such, or before an arbitrator, and that such circumstance, false entry or false statement, so appearing in evidence, may cause any person who in such proceeding is to form an opinion upon the evidence, to entertain an erroneous opinion³ touching any point material⁴ to the result of such proceeding, is said "to fabricate false evidence".

COMMENT.

The wording of this section is so general as to cover any species of crime which consists in the endeavour to injure another by supplying false data upon which to rest a judicial decision.

Ingredients.—The offence defined in this section contains the following ingredients:—

1. Causing any circumstance to exist, or making
 - (a) any false entry in a book or record, or
 - (b) a document containing a false statement.
2. That such circumstance, false entry, or false statement must have been intended to appear in evidence in
 - (i) a judicial proceeding, or
 - (ii) a proceeding taken by law before a public servant or an arbitrator.
3. That such circumstance, false entry or false statement so appearing in evidence, might cause any person, who, in such proceeding, is to form an opinion upon the evidence, to entertain an erroneous opinion.
4. The formation of opinion should be touching any point material to the result of such proceeding.

1. 'Causes any circumstance to exist, or makes any false entry in any book or record, or makes any document containing a false statement'.—The person accused must be proved to have done any of these things. An entry would be false entry or a statement in a record or document if it does either by reason of some false additions or of some material omissions misrepresents the truth. The omission may be illegal or may not be illegal. The thing to consider is what is the effect of the omission on the entry as made or on the statement as occurring in a document.¹² A person commits the offence of fabricating false evidence, if he makes a document which, though it may not contain any false statement in express terms, yet contains false recitals which imply such a false statement.¹³

Mere indiscretion in signing a fabricated document without knowing its contents will not render a person liable.¹⁴ Intention is the gist of the offence under this section. See s. 193, infra.

An offence of abetting the making of a false document can be committed by attesting the document even if the document does not require attestation to complete it, if the person who brings this document into existence intended that it should be attested and that the accused should be one of the attestors. The document in such circumstances is, therefore, not complete until the accused had signed. He, therefore, abets the making of a false document, and where he must have known that the document is intended to be used for the purpose for which it is made he is also guilty under s. 193 of fabricating false evidence.¹⁵

2. 'That such circumstance, etc., may appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding, or in a proceeding . . . before a public servant, etc.'—Judicial proceeding.—The Code of Criminal Procedure says that 'judicial proceeding' includes any proceeding in the course of which evidence is or may be legally taken on oath [s. 4(m)]. The power to take evidence on oath, which includes affirmation as well,¹⁶ is the characteristic test of 'judicial proceeding'.

But the above definition will chiefly apply to cases relating to procedure.¹⁷ The expression 'judicial proceeding' has been the subject of the following judicial interpretations:—

(1) It means nothing more nor less than a step taken by the Court in the course of the administration of justice in connection with a case pending.¹⁸

(2) An inquiry is judicial if the object of it is to determine a jural relation between one person and another, or a group of persons; or between him and the community generally; but, even a judge, acting without such an object in view, is not acting judicially.¹⁹

(6) An investigation under Chapter XIV of the Code of Criminal Procedure is a stage of a judicial proceeding.²³

(7) A preliminary inquiry by a Court under s. 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code is a judicial proceeding.²⁴

Stephen²⁵ says that a 'judicial proceeding' means a proceeding which takes place in or under the authority of any Court of Justice, or which relates in any way to the administration of justice, or which legally ascertains any right or liability.

Cases.—Where the accused was convicted of having voluntarily assisted in concealing stolen railway pins in a certain person's house and field, with a view to having such innocent person punished as an offender, it was held that the Magistrate was right in convicting and punishing the accused for the two separate offences of fabricating false evidence for use in a stage of a judicial proceeding, and of voluntarily assisting in concealing stolen property under s. 414.¹ A public servant, in charge as such of certain documents, having been required to produce them, and being unable to do so, fabricated and produced similar documents with the intention of screening himself from punishment. It was held that his offence fell within this section.² Where the date of a document, which would otherwise not have been presented for registration within time, was altered for the purpose of getting it registered, it was held that this offence was committed.³

One C, whose brother D was an accused person, applied to the Court on behalf of the accused asking that the witnesses for the prosecution might first of all be made to identify D. The Court assenting to his request, C produced before the Court ten or twelve men, none of whom could be identified as D by any of the witnesses. Upon being asked by the Court where D was, C pointed out a man, who was not D. It was held that C was guilty of fabricating false evidence.⁴

The accused transferred the whole of his property in favour of his wife, but before registering the sale deed mortgaged the property to F. The sale deed was, however, registered after the mortgagee had made all necessary inquiry at the Registration Office. After the registration of the sale deed the mortgage deed was also registered. The accused was also charged for cheating the mortgagee. It appeared during the trial that the mortgage deed filed by the complainant bore on it an endorsement of the return of the consideration although there was no such endorsement on it when it was filed in Court. The accused was thereupon further charged for fabricating false evidence, and forgery. It was held that the accused was guilty of fabricating false evidence and cheating, as he must be presumed to know the probable result of his action and it obviously could not have been absent from his mind when he forged the endorsement that he was thereby attempting to defraud the mortgagee of his money.⁵ The accused, who was in possession of the complainant's house as a yearly tenant, about the time the tenancy came to an end, prepared another rent-note for a period of four years and got it registered, without the complainant's knowledge. It was held that the accused had committed this offence inasmuch as the rent-note, which contained an admission against the interest of the accused, could be admitted in evidence on his behalf.⁶ Where the accused had unsuccessfully sought to obtain a woman in marriage and thereafter made and registered a kobala (agreement) in her favour falsely reciting that he had married her, and purporting to convey to her a plot of land in lieu of her dower, it was held that he had acted in furtherance of his desire to secure her person; that, as this could, under the circumstances, be done only by judicial proceedings, his intention was to use the document with its false statements, in a judicial proceeding and thereby to mislead the Court, and that he was, therefore, guilty of an offence under s. 193.⁷ The accused owed money to the complainant and sent a registered and insured packet purporting to contain currency notes in settlement of the debt. The packet contained waste paper. The complainant sued the accused for the debt, and the accused filed an application in the Court of the Subordinate Judge to receive the complainant's signed acknowledgment of the receipt of the packet as collateral evidence in proof of satisfaction. It was held that the only offence committed by the accused was an offence punishable under s. 193.⁸

Attempt.—Where the accused person had dug a hole intending to place salt therein, in order that the discovery of the salt so placed might be used in evidence against his enemy in a judicial proceeding, it was held that he was guilty of an attempt to fabricate false evidence.⁹

Abetment.—M instigated Z to personate C and to purchase in C's name certain stamped paper, in consequence of which the vendor of the stamped paper endorsed C's name on such paper as the purchaser of it. M acted with the intention that such endorsement might be used against C in a judicial proceeding. It was held that the offence of fabricating false evidence was actually committed, and that M was guilty of abetting it.¹⁰

Where an accused person merely countersigned a report which was never read out to him and of the contents of which he was not aware, it was held that the act amounted to an indiscretion on his part, and he was not guilty of abetting the fabrication of a false report.¹¹

Not judicial proceeding.—Where the bailiffs of a Court, twelve in number, were always called upon to swear the service of summons in different cases before the Court, and it was the practice to call them all up at the beginning of each day, and to affirm them all at the time solemnly to give true evidence in all cases coming before the Court on that day and one of the bailiffs at a late hour of the day gave false evidence, it was held that he was guilty under s. 193 although he was not affirmed to speak the truth in that suit after it was called on for hearing and the names of cases in the day's list were not mentioned when the affirmation was administered.¹²

An inquiry by a Magistrate with a view to tracing the writer of an anonymous letter addressed to him, charging certain persons with murder and without any reference to the truth or otherwise of the charge of murder;¹³ an inquiry by a Magistrate to discover the writer of a scandalous petition;¹⁴ a preliminary inquiry, by a Subordinate Magistrate, under the direction of a District Magistrate, into the circumstances of a complaint against the police;¹⁵ the recording of a statement by a Third Class Magistrate having no authority to carry on the preliminary inquiry in the case;¹⁶ and a reference to a District Judge by the Telegraph authorities of a letter for verification,¹⁷ were held to be not judicial proceedings.

The Calcutta High Court has held that execution proceedings subsequent to the trial of a suit are not judicial proceedings.¹⁸ The Bombay High Court has ruled that execution proceedings are judicial proceedings for the purpose of this section and

s. 193. It is not essential for the purpose of these sections that the judicial proceeding in which the person intends to use the false evidence must be pending at the date of the fabrication.¹⁹ It is enough that there is a reasonable prospect of such a proceeding having regard to the circumstances of the case and that the fabricated document is intended to be used in such a proceeding.²⁰ Proceedings before a Debt Settlement Board are not judicial proceedings, except for the limited purpose of s. 228.²¹

3. 'Proceeding... before a public servant'.—As to the definition of 'public servant' see s. 21, supra. The provisions of this section are not confined to false evidence to be used in judicial proceedings. It is sufficient if the evidence is to be used to influence a public servant in any proceeding taken by law before him.²² Where, therefore, the accused, in order to save an estate from forfeiture, made a false entry of rent received in a public book kept by him for the purpose of informing the Collector as to the rents which had been paid into the Collectorate and as to what estates the rents were in arrear, so that he might take steps to enforce payment, it was held that the accused had committed an offence under this section.²³ N, one of the accused, was proposing to sell some property to B. An agreement, dated 23rd May, was written out by N on a stamp paper of Rs. 5. The sale having fallen through, it became necessary to apply to the Collector for a refund of the stamp duty. N took advice with regard to this and was told that no refund would be made after two months. M, the other accused, gave him this advice and also told him that he might alter the date in the document from 23rd May to 23rd September. This was unnecessary as the period was six months and not two. It was held that they were guilty of fabricating and abetting the fabrication of false evidence.²⁴ Where a patwari was directed by a revenue Court to prepare a written statement, in order to obviate the necessity of taking down his evidence, and he submitted such statement on oath and the statement was proved to be false, it was held that he was guilty of fabricating false evidence.²⁵

No fabrication if public servant not authorised to hold investigation.—The making up of accounts falsely with the intention of producing them before a Forest Officer not empowered by law to hold an investigation and take evidence does not amount to fabrication of false evidence.¹ If the proceedings, in which evidence is given, are not judicial proceedings or are ultra vires, no offence is committed.²

Evidence fabricated must be admissible evidence.—If the evidence fabricated is not admissible in evidence then there is no fabrication of false evidence under this section.³ The soundness of this view is doubted by the Calcutta High Court⁴ on the ground that it is the intention that creates the criminal offence and not the fact as to whether, under the terms of the law, the document is admissible in evidence. Decisions laying down that s. 192 is limited to such cases as those in which the fabricated evidence is, in fact, admissible under the terms of the law of evidence, are doubtful and the view expressed in such decisions might raise considerable difficulty in cases where the Judge has improperly admitted in evidence a document not admissible under the terms of the law.⁵ The mere fact that a document would be ultimately inadmissible in evidence does not necessarily take it out of the mischief of s. 193.⁶ Nevertheless, since every one is presumed to know the law, it is submitted that a Court may draw the presumption in favour of an accused person that, when what is fabricated is by law inadmissible in evidence, there was no intention on the part of the fabricator that it should appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding. Such a presumption could, of course, be rebutted by proof of other facts, e.g. an actual attempt by the fabricator to use the fabricated matter in evidence. The former Chief Court of the Punjab dissented from this view. It held that a person was guilty of fabricating false evidence when he made a false entry in a document intending that it should appear in evidence and mislead the Judge or Magistrate, and the mere fact that the entry was not legally admissible in evidence could not affect his guilt.⁷

The section itself says nothing about admissibility or inadmissibility, but if an accused person is presumed to know the law, he is perhaps entitled to the benefit, as well as being subject to the detriment, of this presumption. If the evidence fabricated is inadmissible evidence, then prima facie the accused knew this, and did not intend the evidence to be used in a judicial proceeding. But an actual attempt to secure the admission of inadmissible and fabricated evidence, if proved, might rebut a presumption that there was no intention to use what the fabricator knew, or ought to have known, was inadmissible.

Cases.—Where a police-officer, who had suppressed a document, made a false entry in his diary to support his assertion that he had forwarded certain documents, intending that such entry might be used as evidence in his behalf that he had so forwarded the document, it was held that the evidence fabricated must be admissible evidence and as the entry would not be admissible in his behalf, though contrary to his intention, he was not liable.⁸ Where a police-officer made a false entry in the special diary relating to a case which was being investigated by him but the document in which the alleged false entry was made was not one which was admissible in evidence, it was held that he was not guilty under this section.⁹ Similarly, where a person made a false statement in the recital of title to property in a document when such statement was not admissible in evidence against the person or persons against whose interest such statement was made, it was held that he was not guilty.¹⁰

On an indictment for perjury committed on the hearing of a charge of assault by a husband on his wife, an assignment of perjury in a statement by the accused, as a witness for the husband, that he had seen the wife committing adultery (of which he had told the husband), was held bad for immateriality, as the supposed statement would not be legally relevant to the charge of assault as affording no ground of legal justification.¹¹

4. 'That such circumstance... may cause any person who in such proceeding is to form an opinion... to entertain an erroneous opinion'.—The false evidence must lead to the formation of an erroneous opinion. If a document does not lead to the forming of an erroneous opinion touching a particular point but leads rather to the forming of a correct opinion, then this offence is not committed.¹²

5. 'Touching any point material'.—False evidence under this section should be material to the case in which it is given though not so under s. 191.¹³ The word 'material' means of such a nature as to affect in anyway, directly or indirectly, the probability of anything to be determined by the proceeding, or the credit of any witness, and a fact may be material although evidence of its existence was improperly admitted.¹⁴ Hawkins¹⁵ says that he "cannot find this matter anywhere thoroughly settled or debated, and therefore shall leave it to every man's own judgment, which, from the consideration of the circumstances of each particular case, may generally, without any great difficulty, discern whether the matter in which perjury is assigned, were wholly impertinent, idle, and insignificant, or not, which seems to be the best rule for determining whether it be punishable as perjury or not".

All false statements wilfully and corruptly made by a witness as to matters which affect his credit are material, and he is liable to be convicted of perjury in respect of such statements.¹⁶ Every question on cross-examination of a witness, which goes to his credit, is material.¹⁷ Again, "if a witness is allowed to give evidence, though it may afterwards turn out that his testimony ought not to have been admitted, perjury may nevertheless be assigned upon his answer. It does not lie in the witness's mouth to say that his evidence was immaterial, especially when, if believed, it might most seriously have injured the party against whom it was given".¹⁸

The evidence fabricated must be 'material'.—English cases.—The accused had been charged with selling beer without a license, and had falsely sworn that, when previously charged with a similar offence, he had not authorized a plea of guilty to be put in, and that such plea had been put in without his knowledge and against his will. It was held that, as such statements affected the accused's credit as a witness, they were material, and he was rightly convicted of perjury.¹⁹ Upon the trial of one S for robbery, the accused, in support of an alibi, swore, first, that S was in a certain house at the time of the robbery; secondly, that S had lived in that house for the last two years; and, thirdly, that he had never been absent from it more than two or three nights together during that time. In fact S had been confined in prison during one out of those two years. It was held that the second and third allegations were material as tending to render more credible the truth of the first, and that the accused were rightly convicted of perjury assigned upon them.²⁰ On the trial of A for perjury, in an affidavit made by him, the signature to the affidavit was proved to be in A's handwriting, but there was no evidence that A was the person who swore to the truth of the affidavit. The defendant was then called as a witness, and swore that the affidavit was used before the taxing master when A was present, and that it was then publicly said that it was A's affidavit. The defendant was then indicted for perjury committed on A's trial, and the indictment alleged that it was a material question on such trial whether A was so present before the taxing master, and whether the affidavit was then used in A's presence, and whether it was then stated publicly that the affidavit was A's. It was held that the above questions were material on the trial of A.²¹ The accused was sued for debt under the name of 'Burnard Edward Mullany'. The Judge asked the accused what his name was. He replied 'Edward'. To questions by the plaintiff's attorney the accused denied that his name was 'Burnard', and said that his name was 'Edward' only. The Judge struck out the cause. The accused was indicted for perjury; and it was proved that his real name was 'Burnard', but that he had latterly been known by the name of 'Burnard Edward'. It was held that the Judge having acted upon these statements, they were sufficiently material to sustain a conviction for perjury.²² In an action by an executrix, for goods sold, she falsely swore on cross-examination that she had never been tried at the Old Bailey and had never been in custody at the Thames Police Station. It was held, on the trial of an indictment for perjury, that this evidence was material.²³

No fabrication if no erroneous opinion could be formed touching any point material to result of proceeding.—Where a person produced, as evidence in a suit, a registered deed of sale in which the property sold was wrongly numbered, and which was corrected by himself subsequent to registration,²⁴ where a Vakil presented a vakalatnama falsely purporting to have been executed before an officer and to bear his signature;²⁵ where there was a dispute as to the ownership of articles in a box in the accused's house and he made a hole in the wall of the house, and removed the article he claimed, his object being to make it appear that there had been a theft, but he did not charge any one with having committed the theft;¹ where a patwari, knowing that certain documents were forged, made entries in his papers corresponding to and based on those documents;² and where a kabuliat was made and signed by the lessees alone with the intention of causing it to be believed that an agreement to let, therein recited, had been made by the agent of the land-owner and with her assent,³ it was held that there was no fabrication. Certain cattle were sold in a market on the 21st of March, 1917. A clerk, whose duty it was to register sales of cattle held at that market and give receipts to the purchaser, gave a receipt on the 27th March, and dated it the 27th March, but subsequently altered the date to the 21st, the actual date of sale. It was held that there was no case of fabricating false evidence, for the alteration of the date was not intended to lead any one to form an erroneous opinion touching the date of sale but the contrary.⁴

English cases.—Where a witness being asked, whether such a sum of money were paid for two things in controversy between the parties, answered, that it was, where in truth it was paid only for one of them by agreement, it was held that he could not be punished for perjury.⁵ Where a witness being asked by a Judge whether A brought a certain number of sheep from one town to another all together, answered, that he did so, where in truth A did not bring them all together, but part at one time and part at another, it was held that he was not guilty of perjury, because the substance of the question was, whether A did bring them at all or not, and that the manner of bringing them was only a circumstance.⁶ Where a witness swore that a person drew his dagger and wounded J, where in truth he beat him with a staff, it was held that he was not guilty of perjury, because the beating only was material.⁷ On the trial of one B, charged with a garrotte robbery on W, the accused cross-examined W, as to whether he had not met him the evening before the robbery along with one M, and proposed to them to commit a burglary. The prosecutor denying this, the accused called M as his witness, who swore that he did meet the prosecutor along with the accused the night before the burglary, and that the prosecutor did propose to them to commit a burglary. On the trial of M for perjury, it was held that the evidence was not material.⁸

Fabrication of false evidence by accused.—The authors of the Code say: “we do not propose to punish him for fabricating evidence with the view of escaping punishment, unless he also contemplated some injury to others as likely to be produced by the evidence so fabricated...If A, after having stabbed Z, in order to escape detection, disposes Z’s body in such a manner as is likely to lead a jury to think the death accidental, we do not propose to punish A as the fabricator of false evidence.”⁹ The Allahabad High Court once held that the accused could not be charged with fabricating false evidence with the object of diverting suspicion from himself and concealing his guilt.¹⁰ But subsequently it has held that an accused person can be convicted for fabricating false evidence.¹¹ The Bombay High Court has differed from the former decision of the Allahabad High Court in a case in which Macleod, C.J., observed: “To hold that an accused person may use and fabricate false evidence with impunity so long as he does not bribe anyone to assist him would appear to me to open a very wide door to the fabrication of false defences.”¹² and whoever intentionally gives or fabricates false evidence in any other case,⁴ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, in an enquiry before a Magistrate for the purpose of ascertaining whether Z ought to be committed for trial, makes on oath a statement which he knows to be false. As this enquiry is a stage of a judicial proceeding, A has given false evidence.

Explanation 3.—An investigation directed by a Court of Justice according to law, and conducted under the authority of a Court of Justice, is a stage of a judicial proceeding, though that investigation may not take place before a Court of Justice.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, in an enquiry before an officer deputed by a Court of Justice to ascertain on the spot the boundaries of land, makes on oath a statement which he knows to be false. As this enquiry is a stage of a judicial proceeding, A has given false evidence.

COMMENT.

This section specifies the punishment which would be inflicted for offences described in ss. 191 and 192. If the offences are committed in any stage of a judicial proceeding they are more severely punishable than when they are committed in a non-judicial proceeding.

1. 'Intentionally'.—Intention is the essential ingredient in the constitution of this offence.¹³ Proof of corrupt intention is not necessary. It is enough to prove intention, and if the statement was false, and known or believed by the accused to be false, it may be presumed that in making that statement he intentionally gave false evidence.¹⁴ False evidence is intentionally given if the person making the statement makes it advisedly, knowing it to be false, and with the intention of deceiving the Court and of leading it to be supposed that that which he states is true.¹⁵ It is not sufficient to show that the witness probably knew the real facts. It must be shown that he had personal knowledge.¹⁶ The Court may infer the corrupt intention from surrounding circumstances.¹⁷ If, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, it appears that the falsehood was not wilful, but rather proceeded from inadvertence or a mistake as to the true nature of the question, the evidence could not be considered to be false evidence intentionally given. An inconsistent statement made during cross-examination is not perjury if it is the result of confusion or mistake. If a man reverts to the truth in the course of the trial, he cannot be prosecuted for perjury.¹⁸

A man cannot be convicted of perjury for having acted rashly, or for having failed to make a reasonable inquiry with regard to the facts alleged by him to be true.¹⁹ It must be proved that he made some statement which he knew to be false, or which he did not believe to be true.²⁰

2. 'Gives false evidence in any stage of a judicial proceeding'.—A Court is not justified in ordering prosecution of a person for perjury in respect of a statement which is literally and strictly speaking true.²¹ Where a person answers questions put to him in a judicial proceeding after he is sworn to tell the truth and the answers are not true, he commits perjury, whether the questions which he has answered are such as should have been or could have been properly asked.²² An identifier who knowingly makes a false affidavit of service of process for the purpose of being used in a judicial proceeding, commits an offence under this section.²³ By 'any stage of a judicial proceeding' is meant any step taken by the Court in the course of administration of justice in connection with a case pending.²⁴

If the statement of the accused is designedly false he is liable for the consequences irrespective of the fact whether the statement had a material bearing or not upon the matter which was under inquiry before the Court. The materiality or immateriality of the statement could have a bearing upon the question of sentence which was to be passed in the case.²⁵ Where the complainant made an inaccurate statement that he had been acquitted in a certain case not with a view to adding anything to the gravity of the offence, with which the accused in the case had been charged, but with a view apparently to appropriate some amount of credibility for himself and the statement was not a material statement in the sense that it did not in any way hamper the course of justice, because the accused were, as a matter of fact, acquitted. It was held that it was not one of those cases in which it could be said that the interest of justice would be advanced by prosecuting a person who has given a fraudulently false evidence which has interfered with the course of justice. It was one of those routine statements which are made by almost every witness.¹

An inquiry under s. 11 of the Frontier Crimes Regulation,² or a proceeding held by a Magistrate into the conduct of a village headman against whom reports have been made³ is not a 'judicial proceeding' within the meaning of this section; but a proceeding before an additional Income-tax Officer, on the production of account books, pursuant to a notice under s. 23 (2) of the Income-tax Act⁴ or an inquiry or investigation by a Court or Board under s. 9 of the Trade Disputes Act (VII of 1929) is.

This section does not apply to a false deposition given before a Court of a Native State.⁵

3. 'Fabricates false evidence for the purpose of being used in any stage of a judicial proceeding'.—The word 'fabrication' refers to the fabrication of false evidence; and if the evidence fabricated is intended to be used in a judicial proceeding, the offence is committed as soon as the fabrication is complete; it is immaterial that the judicial proceeding has not yet been commenced.⁶

It is not essential to show that any actual use has been made of the evidence fabricated. The mere fabrication is punishable under this section: the use of the fabricated article is punishable under s. 196.

The misreading of a document for the information of the Magistrate by a witness does not amount to fabricating false evidence.⁷

4. 'Intentionally gives or fabricates false evidence in any other case'.—A conviction may be had under this section, even if the evidence be given in matters not judicial, but it must be proved that the false statement was made under the sanction of law.⁸

Explanation 2.—A preliminary inquiry held by a Court under s. 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code is a stage of a judicial proceeding under this Explanation, and a person giving false evidence in the course of it commits an offence under this section.⁹

The Bombay High Court has, in a full bench case, laid down that a statement recorded by a Magistrate in the course of a police investigation under s. 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code is not evidence in a stage of a judicial proceeding within the meaning of this Explanation.¹⁰ The Lahore High Court has held likewise.¹¹

Amendment.—The words “or before a Military Court of Request” after “Court-martial” in Explanation 1 were repealed by the Cantonments Act (XIII of 1889). Act XIII of 1889 was repealed by Act XV of 1910, which in turn has been repealed by Act II of 1924.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the following points for giving ‘false evidence’ :—

(1) That the accused was legally bound to state the truth, either by an oath or by an express provision of law,¹² or

That the accused made the declaration in question.

Due administration of the oath to the accused person should be proved like any other fact.¹³

(2) That he made such statement or declaration whilst so bound.¹⁴

(3) That such statement, or declaration, was made in a stage of a judicial proceeding.¹⁵

(4) That the statement or declaration is false.¹⁶

It must be shown that the false statement charged against the accused is literally false. There must be a statement of fact which is false. It is no offence if the fact stated is true but some circumstance is suppressed, with the result that a wrong inference may be deduced.¹⁷

(5) That the accused when making such statement or declaration, (a) knew it to be false, or (b) believed it to be false, or (c) did not believe it to be true.¹⁸

(6) That he made such false statement intentionally.

If the accused proves that he did not intentionally make any false statement, he is entitled to be acquitted.¹⁹

If the case falls under the second part of the section it is not necessary to prove (3).

Prove the following points for ‘fabricating false evidence’ :—

(1) That the accused (a) caused a certain circumstance to exist, or (b) made the false entry, or (c) made the document to contain a false statement.

(2) That he did as in (1) intending that such circumstance, entry, or statement should appear in evidence (a) in a judicial proceeding, or (b) in a proceeding taken by law, before a public servant, or (c) in a proceeding before an arbitrator.

There must be a distinct finding to this effect. Where the accused by falsely representing to the Marriage Registrar that a certain marriage had been solemnized, induced the Registrar to make a false entry of the registration of the marriage, it was held that he could not be convicted of the offence of fabricating false evidence under this section in the absence of a finding that the intention of the accused was that the false entry in the marriage register might appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding or some other proceeding of a like nature as contemplated by s. 192.²⁰

(3) That the person conducting the judicial or other proceeding had to form an opinion upon the evidence in which such false evidence appeared.²¹

(4) That the accused intended that person to entertain an erroneous opinion upon the evidence.

(5) That such erroneous opinion touched a point material to the result of such proceeding. It should be distinctly shown whether the evidence on which perjury is assigned is material in respect of matters in issue in the cause.²²

If the case falls under the second part of the section it is not necessary to prove (a) in (2).

Nature of proof.—The true rule in a case of giving false evidence is “that no man can be convicted of giving false evidence, except on proof of facts which, if accepted as true, shew not merely that it is incredible, but that it is impossible that the statements of the party accused made on oath can be true. If the inference from the facts proved falls short of this, it seems to us that there is nothing on which a conviction can stand; because, assuming all that is proved to be true, it is still possible that no crime was committed.”²³

According to the Indian Evidence Act no particular number of witnesses is required to prove any fact, though perjury according to English law must be proved by two witnesses, or by one witness, confirmed either by a written document, or by some material and relevant facts which contradict the statement upon which the perjury is assigned. It has been laid down that in ordinary cases and where the provisions peculiar to the Indian law do not apply, the rule of English law which is founded on substantial justice may well serve as a safe guide to those who have to administer the criminal law in India.²⁴ The Allahabad High Court has differed from this view and has held that the dictum of English common law that the testimony of a single witness is not sufficient to sustain an indictment for perjury is not a safe guide for the Indian Courts, which are bound by the statute law enacted in ss. 3 and 134 of the Indian Evidence Act.²⁵

Before a conviction for perjury can be sustained on the strength of one man's oath against another, it must be shown either that the person is of such outstanding character that it is impossible to conceive of him telling a lie in circumstances with which the Court is dealing or that that person's word is so strongly corroborated that no reasonable Judge could do otherwise than believe him.¹

The statement which the accused is charged with having made before a Magistrate should be clearly proved to have been made by him.² No evidence which does not profess to give the exact words by the accused can alone be a safe foundation for a conviction.³ But it is sufficient if a witness states from recollection the evidence the defendant gave, though he did not take it down in writing, and cannot say with certainty that it was all the evidence the defendant gave, if he can say with certainty that it was all he gave on that point, and that he said nothing to qualify it.⁴

The prosecution should make out that there was on the day stated in the charge a judicial proceeding pending, and that the accused in the course of that proceeding made the statement alleged to be false.⁵ It is desirable that the due administration of the oath to the accused person on the occasion in question should be proved like any other fact.⁶

Under this section read with s. 192, an offence is committed if evidence is fabricated either in connection with some judicial proceedings or quasi-judicial proceedings pending or contemplated at the time of the fabrication. If the charge is that the evidence has been fabricated in connection with proceedings which are only contemplated by the accused, the burden will be upon the Crown to prove the fact that proceedings were contemplated.⁷

A conviction for an offence under this section may be based on circumstantial evidence.⁸

Proceedings in trial.—The proceedings in a criminal trial, when necessary to be proved, should be proved by their production.⁹

The record of proceedings in the Small Cause Court is not admissible in evidence unless authenticated by the signature of the presiding Judge.¹⁰

Depositions.—When a person is charged with giving false evidence upon a deposition made before a Magistrate, it is necessary first to prove that he is the person who gave such evidence; that it was given in a judicial proceeding, (e.g. on the complaint of AB against CD) on or about a certain day; and that he gave it on oath or affirmation. Where the deposition is accompanied by a memorandum signed by a Magistrate and the Magistrate's signature thereto is proved, then the deposition is proof of what the person charged with perjury stated, and he is concluded by it.¹¹ It is always necessary to prove the deposition alleged to contain the false statement.¹²

If the deposition on which the prosecution is based is not properly taken the conviction cannot be sustained, e.g. if it is not read over and interpreted to the witness in accordance with the provisions of O. XVIII, r. 5, of the Civil Procedure Code, before it is signed by him.¹³ The perusal of his deposition by a witness is a substantial compliance with r. 5, O. XVIII, of the Civil Procedure Code, and such deposition, when duly signed by the Judge, is admissible under s. 80 of the Evidence Act, without proof, on a subsequent trial of the deponent for giving false evidence.¹⁴ The provisions of O. XVIII, rr. 5 and 6, of the Civil Procedure Code, are directory, and non-compliance therewith does not render the deposition inadmissible on a subsequent trial of the deponent either for giving false evidence or for abetment of forgery and of dishonest user of a bond proved by him, in the course of a civil suit.¹⁵ Where there was no evidence to show that the deposition of a witness in a civil suit was not read over to him by the Judge, it must be presumed under s. 80 of the Evidence Act that the Judge complied with the provisions of O. XVIII, r. 5, of the Civil Procedure Code; and that an accused person might be convicted of the offence of having given false evidence before a civil Court notwithstanding that the Court had made no note in writing to the effect that the evidence had been read out to the deponent.¹⁶ A hearsay statement recorded by a Magistrate cannot be made the subject of a prosecution under this section.¹⁷

The Privy Council has laid down that non-compliance with the provisions of s. 360, Criminal Procedure Code, would not by itself be a ground sufficient for quashing a conviction, though it might be taken into account with other elements of objection to the satisfactory character of a trial.¹⁸ Under the Privy Council ruling, s. 537, Criminal Procedure Code, cures the defect of non-compliance with the provisions of s. 360, but it is submitted the Privy Council ruling will not apply where the provisions of O. XVIII, r. 5, of the Civil Procedure Code, are not complied with because there is no provision similar to s. 537 in the Civil Procedure Code.

There can be no conviction under this section based on a false statement which is not made and recorded with all due formalities in the manner required by law.¹⁹ The deposition itself ought to be put in, and proceedings in the case ought also to be put in to show the nature of the proceedings in which the evidence is given. evidence of the contents of the deposition is inadmissible under s. 91 of the Evidence Act.²⁰ Where the law requires the evidence to be taken down in writing, a certified copy of the deposition must be placed on the record. The certified copy should also show on the face of it that it is a copy of part of the record in a specified proceeding. The mere production of a certified copy is not sufficient to show that the accused is the person who made the statement. There must be oral evidence of some one, who heard the deposition given, that the accused is the person whose evidence is therein recorded.²¹

The record of a previous deposition given by the accused is relevant and necessary evidence. Such record is not inadmissible under s. 145 of the Evidence Act.²²

The failure of a civil Court to make a memorandum of the evidence of the accused when examined before it does not vitiate the deposition, if the evidence itself was duly recorded in the language in which it was delivered in such Court.²³

Powers of appellate Court.—"It is an unusual and not . . . a proper procedure for an Appellate Court which did not hear the evidence to order a prosecution for perjury in the lower Court on materials which were not before that Court and which the witness had no opportunity of explaining while in the box."²⁴

Contradictory statements.—Where a person makes two contradictory statements he may not be charged in the alternative and convicted of intentionally giving false evidence, although it cannot be proved which of these contradictory statements was false.²⁵ Thus the confusion created by the vast array of conflicting rulings of the different High Courts is done away with. But where there are two contradictory statements of a witness there is no reason why the Court should not apply its mind to discover which of them is true.¹

A statement made by an approver, to whom pardon has been tendered not in the course of any "inquiry" under the Criminal Procedure Code, cannot form the basis of an alternative charge of an offence punishable under this section.²

If one of the statements is made before a Magistrate not having authority to carry on a preliminary inquiry in the case and the other before a Magistrate having jurisdiction, there will not be a sufficient basis for an alternative charge of giving false evidence.³ But where a witness had made one statement on oath before a Third Class Magistrate under s. 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and again another and totally inconsistent statement at the trial of the case before a First Class Magistrate, it was held that he could be convicted under the second—if not under the first—paragraph of this section.⁴ A full bench of the Bombay High Court has held that although a statement which is made in the course of a police investigation under s. 164, Criminal Procedure Code, is not evidence in a stage of a judicial proceeding but comes within the words "evidence in any other case" in the second clause of this section, yet it can be linked with a statement which is evidence in a stage of the judicial proceeding following on the investigation, so that the two can be said to be a series of acts on which an alternative charge can be framed, under s. 236 of the Criminal Procedure Code.⁵ This ruling of the Full Bench is doubted in a subsequent case in which it is held that for the purposes of s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, before a Court can sanction a prosecution of a person for perjury for making a statement under s. 164 of the Code and a contrary statement subsequently before the committing Magistrate, it is absolutely essential that the Court should be satisfied that the latter statement was untrue. There can be no prosecution if the former statement is untrue; and a fortiori there can be no prosecution if the Court is not in a position to find out which of the two statements is false.⁶ Where an accused person is examined by a Magistrate for the sake of obtaining information on which proceedings can be taken, the Magistrate cannot legally examine him on oath, nor can the accused be said at that stage of the proceedings to be a witness even though he were examined on oath. Consequently it was held that any charge for giving false evidence founded on such statement was bad and that a conviction and sentence founded on such statement as being contrary to another statement made by the accused when examined as a witness at the trial, without any proof or finding that the second statement was false, could not be maintained.⁷ It is not necessary that the contradictory statements must have been made at different inquiries or trials to render a person liable to conviction.⁸ It is, however, clear that the case of a witness making contradictory statements in the course of the same deposition is different from the case of a witness making contradictory statements in the course of different depositions recorded at different times. Usually it is not expedient to prosecute a witness who has made contradictory statements in the course of the same deposition, because the presumption is that the witness is trying to correct a false statement by his subsequent statement, and in such cases some locus poenitentiae should be given to the witness, but this does not apply where different depositions are recorded after an interval of time.⁹ The accused deposed before a Magistrate that he had seen P and others gambling in a certain place. The deposition was read over to the accused and acknowledged by him to be correct. In his cross-examination some days after he deposed he did not know P and had never seen him gambling. He was charged and convicted under this section of having intentionally given false evidence in that he made two contradictory statements one of which he either knew or believed to be false or did not believe to be true. On the question being raised, on revision, whether the conviction was legal or illegal, by reason of the fact that the contradictory statements were made before the same Magistrate and in the course of one and the same trial, it was held by two Judges that the conviction was legal.¹⁰ The fact of a witness having made contradictory statements before the committing Magistrate and in Court would not alone justify any step to prosecute him for perjury. Under exceptional circumstances such a step may be taken.¹¹

With respect to the kind or amount of confirmatory proof required, it must be considered in each case whether the particular evidence offered is sufficient to induce a belief in the truth of the contradictory statement or direct testimony.¹² Every possible presumption in favour of a reconciliation of the two statements should be made, and it must be found that they are absolutely irreconcilable before a conviction can be had upon the ground that one of them is necessarily false.¹³ An opportunity should always be given to the accused to explain what he meant by two apparently contradictory statements.¹⁴

It is necessary to prove that both the contradictory statements were such that a charge of giving intentionally false evidence might have been made in regard to either of them or in regard to both of them in the alternative.¹⁵ A witness making two contradictory statements in the course of the same deposition cannot ordinarily be held to have committed perjury in one or the other of them alternatively. If the first can be proved untrue he can be found guilty, technically, of an attempt to commit perjury at the most, and if the second can be proved untrue he can be convicted of perjury, but if neither is affirmatively proved untrue he cannot be convicted in the alternative of anything more than the attempt.¹⁶

In the case of contradictory statements, although the Court "may believe that on the one, or the other occasion the prisoner swore what was not true, it is not a necessary consequence that he committed perjury; for there are cases in which a person might very honestly and conscientiously swear to a particular fact from the best of his recollection and belief, and from other circumstances at a subsequent time be convinced that he was wrong and swear to the reverse without meaning to swear falsely either time.¹⁷ The Court dealing with contradictory statements "should not convict unless fully satisfied that the statements are from every point of view irreconcilable, and if the contradiction consists in two statements opposed to each other as to matters of inference or opinion on which a man may take one view at one time and a contrary view at another, there can be no perjury, unless he has on oath stated facts on which his first statement was based and then denied these facts on oath on a subsequent occasion.¹⁸ Where the witness has corrected his previous statement in the same deposition every presumption in favour of his having made the incorrect statement in good faith should be raised in his favour, as it is undesirable that witnesses should be afraid to correct mistakes for fear of rendering themselves liable to prosecution.¹⁹

Where the evidence on which the prosecution relied to prove a statement made by the accused to be false, consisted solely of his own previous contradictory statements, it was held that such evidence was not sufficient to justify a conviction.²⁰

Witnesses should not be prosecuted because they give evidence which is contradictory at two different stages of a case, e.g., first before a Magistrate, secondly, before a Sessions Court. It is only where a Court is expressly of opinion that it is expedient in the interest of justice that an inquiry should be made into the offence of giving false evidence that an order under s. 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure can be made.²¹ Where it is transparent that the criminal case is calculated to hamper the fair trial in a civil Court, no prosecution for perjury should be lodged till after the case is decided by the civil Court.²²

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Presidency Magistrate, or First Class Magistrate.

The making of any number of false statements in the same deposition is one aggregate case of giving false evidence. Charges of false evidence cannot be multiplied according to the number of false statements.²³ But the Bombay High Court has ruled that where a person makes several false statements in the course of a single deposition, he commits as many offences as there are false statements.²⁴

Before criminating a man upon his own statement under examination, it is necessary to see that such statement has been deliberately made and recorded; that after being recorded it has been shown or read to the accused; and that the examination has been attested by the signature of the Magistrate following a certificate to be given under his own hand.²⁵

Deposition to be read as a whole.—A deposition must be read as a whole and a witness must always be given an opportunity of correcting any answer given by him.¹

Reading extracts from the alleged conflicting statements of the accused is not sufficient to enable the jury to form a fair opinion on the question. The whole of the deposition given on each occasion ought to be laid before the jury.² There ought to be a locus poenitentiae for witnesses, who have deposed falsely, retracting their false statements.³

Where a witness, having made a false statement, is cautioned by the trying Judge and is informed of various circumstances which seem to establish the falsehood of that statement, and the witness after such caution acknowledges that his earlier statement was false and corrects it, it is not desirable to subject such a witness to a prosecution for perjury.⁴ Where the accused retracts his false statements, made on solemn oath in a witness-box, only when he discovers that his fraud has been detected, no Court can infer from the subsequent correction or retraction, that there is no intention to give false evidence.⁵

Witness criminating himself.—Although a person under examination as a witness is bound by his affirmation to tell the truth, if he is examined on a point on which he is likely to criminate himself, his position should be explained to him by the Magistrate, as otherwise he may be induced, through ignorance of the state of the law, to deny the existence of facts for fear of penal consequences. Although without such a warning he may make a false denial and thereby become guilty of the offence of intentionally giving false evidence, his offence will not be deserving of severe punishment.⁶

Separate trial.—In prosecutions for giving false evidence the case of each accused person should be separately inquired into, and, if committed for trial, separately tried. It is wholly erroneous to include them in one joint charge.⁷ The joint trial of several persons for perjury is illegal.⁸ A person accused of perjury is entitled to have the specific charge made against him tried quite independently of a like charge against another person.⁹ The Bombay High Court has laid down that the joint trial of two accused is permissible under s. 289 of the Criminal procedure Code if there was a common purpose to make false statements. In such a case there is one transaction from the point of view of both the accused and their joint trial for making false statements to achieve that object is legal.¹⁰ The Lahore High Court has dissented from this view. Where a prosecution of twelve defence witnesses in a gambling case for perjury was ordered by a Sessions Judge, it was held that their joint trial for perjury was illegal.¹¹

Complaint.—Complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which such Court is subordinate, is required.¹² Prosecution should be instituted after due consideration on the part of the Court before whom the false evidence was given, or on the part of a Court to which such Court is subordinate.¹³ The Court is bound to satisfy itself that there is at least a prima facie case, and that there is a reasonable prospect of a successful termination of the prosecution,¹⁴ and that a prosecution is necessary in the interests of justice.¹⁵ The statement must be intentionally false in order to justify a prosecution.¹⁶ The offence of perjury is an offence against public justice. tion should or should not be instituted is the Judge before whom the evidence was given and who had considered all the facts of the case.¹⁷ Perjury is a concomitant of a Court of law, the question always being one of degree. Every act of perjury is, in strict law, an offence, but it does not follow, that on that account every perjurer should be charged.¹⁸ The perjury must be sufficiently serious as to require punishment by a criminal Court.¹⁹

Where an offence is committed under this section in respect of proceedings in a Court of law which are contemplated but which in fact are never started, the Magistrate can take cognizance of the offence without getting any complaint from a Court. The crucial date in the case of an offence committed under this section is the date on which the offence was committed; while for the purpose of s. 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the crucial date is the date when the Court takes cognizance of the offence. Proceedings contemplated at the date of the offence are sufficient to constitute the offence under this section; but proceedings contemplated at the date when the Magistrate takes cognizance are not sufficient to bring the case within s. 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code.²⁰ Ordinarily it is inadvisable to launch a prosecution for perjury under such circumstances as will compel a witness to adhere to his original lie under penalty of a prosecution if he tells the truth.²¹ Where a witness makes a statement which is false and at once admits this, and states what is the real truth, he should not be prosecuted for giving false evidence.²² Prosecutions for perjury should not be ordered where the statements complained of are slightly discrepant owing to inaccuracies of mind and are not deliberately false.²³

No Court should entertain an application to prosecute made by persons who are not parties to the suit out of which the proceedings for giving false evidence arise.²⁴ A complaint should only be made after careful consideration, and having in view the ends of justice and not in order to assist the private ends of individuals. It is desirable in most cases that the Court should have all the facts before it.²⁵

A prosecution for perjury should be instituted as soon as possible. An officer other than he who tried the case in which perjury was committed does not act without jurisdiction, if he files a complaint to prosecute, but it is very much more satisfactory that the complaint should be made by the very Judge in whose Court an offence has actually taken place.¹

A complaint for an offence under this section must specify the false evidence the accused is charged with. The exact words upon which the prosecution is based, and the exact offences which the Magistrate is to investigate should be pointed out.² The particular words which constitute perjury should be specified,³ so that the accused person should not be taken by surprise.⁴ The accused should be in a position to know what statements are alleged to be false.⁵

Although notice is not invariably necessary, the person sought to be prosecuted must be heard.⁶ It is necessary that he should be given an opportunity to substantiate his allegations.⁷ The Court must form judgment upon legal evidence. In cases in which the Magistrate dismisses the original complaint upon a report from the police, there is no legal evidence before him, on which to form his judgment. In cases, however, in which the Magistrate examines the complainant and hears the evidence and acquits or discharges the accused, no notice to the complainant is necessary.⁸ When a civil Court takes action under s. 476 to prosecute a person for perjury such Court is bound to set forth in its order the specific assignments of perjury alleged against the accused. Failure to do so is a material irregularity within the meaning of s. 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure.⁹

Accused must have full notice of the case against him.¹⁰ Complaint to prosecute should not be lightly launched in cases where the Courts would have to determine the question by merely weighing the evidence on both sides.¹¹ The prosecution for perjury is an exceptional measure and complaint ought not to be made when material has only been provided by an unnecessary examination on oath. Magistrates should not be encouraged to make unnecessary examinations on oath in order to obtain material for a prosecution for perjury in case the approver should subsequently resile from his statement.¹²

A Court filing a complaint in respect of contradictory statements must be competent to file a complaint in respect of each of the statements.¹³ When contradictory statements, forming the basis of an alternative charge of giving false evidence, are made before different Courts, the complaint of each of those Courts is necessary before the Court can take cognizance of the charge of giving false evidence.¹⁴ When a person makes a statement in the committing Court and contradicts it in the Sessions Court, the Sessions Judge can complain in the alternative that one or other of the statements must be false, even though the statement in the Sessions Court is true, since the false statement at the committal stage which eventuates in a trial is "in relation to the trial".¹⁵

A Court should not file a complaint when the case in which perjury is committed has gone to a higher tribunal.¹⁶

Notice.—Where a Judge issues notice to the accused to show cause why his prosecution under this section should not be launched he must allow sufficient time for the notice to be served upon the accused and should not file a complaint before the notice has been served.¹⁷

Calcutta Rule.—When, during the investigation of a complaint under Chapter XX of the Criminal Procedure Code, it may appear to the Magistrate that a witness is giving false evidence, so that criminal proceedings against such witness are likely to be necessary, the Magistrate will exercise a sound discretion in taking down, under s. 359, at least the evidence of this particular witness at length in the manner prescribed in ss. 356, 357 and 360.¹⁸

Lahore Rule.—1. The attention of all Magistrates is called to the law regarding 'giving or fabricating false evidence' contained in ss. 191 to 196 of the Indian Penal Code.

2. It may add too much to the already heavy work of Magistrates to prosecute every person who is guilty of these offences, but it is prejudicial to the interests of justice to allow any gross case to pass unnoticed. It is the duty, therefore, of every judicial officer to bring every case which happens in his Court to the notice of the District Magistrate. The District Magistrate will decide whether a prosecution should be instituted.

3. It should be remembered that the provisions of s. 487 of the Code of Criminal Procedure make it clear that a Court before which the offence of giving false evidence has been committed is precluded from trying the offence itself.

4. Attention is also called to ss. 195 and 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure which so far protects witnesses that no prosecutions are to be instituted in the Criminal Courts except on the complaint in writing of the Court before or against which the offence was committed, or of some other Court to which such Court is subordinate. The offence is one against public justice, and the prosecution is not left to the discretion of individuals. Section 476 (B) enables a superior Court, on application, to order the withdrawal of complaint made by a subordinate Court, or to make a complaint which a subordinate Court has refused to make.

5. Sub-section (3) of s. 195 defines, for purposes of these sections, to what Court any Court is subordinate. Thus, a District Magistrate (or any other Magistrate), with powers under s. 80 of the Code, is subordinate to the Court of Session. In districts in which, by Notification under s. 39 of the Punjab Courts Act, the Subordinate Judge of the first class is empowered to hear certain appeals from decrees or orders passed by them, Subordinate Judges other than those of the first and second class are subordinate to the Court of the Senior Subordinate Judge, by whom those appeals are heard.¹⁹ Subordinate Judges of the first and second classes are subordinate to the District Judge. An Assistant Collector of whatever grade is subordinate to the Collector.

6. When perjury on the part of a witness in commitment proceedings is alleged or suspected the committing Magistrate should leave the matter in the hands of the Sessions Judge, or should at least refrain from taking any steps until the case is decided by the Court of Session.

7. The Judges consider that the law against perjury should be fully vindicated against all persons who are convicted of perjury and Magistrates should impose deterrent sentences when convictions are obtained in prosecutions for perjury in the Courts.²⁰

When proceedings to be instituted.—Proceedings under s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, should not be taken against a person for giving false evidence or fabricating a false document under this section until the case in which the said evidence was given or such document was used, has been finally decided.²¹

Bargain to abstain from prosecution.—A Court cannot take cognizance of a bargain to abstain from the prosecution of a person who has committed such an offence as that of wilfully giving false evidence.²²

Charge.—In framing a charge for giving false evidence, the charge should be precise. The charge should show the particular matter in respect of which the accused is put upon his trial; and only so much of the accused's statements ought to be set out as is necessary in order to show the particular false statements relied on by the prosecution.²³ It should contain a distinct assertion with regard to each statement intended to be characterised as perjury.²⁴ It should specifically state what words or expressions the accused is charged with having uttered, and in what respect they are supposed to be false.²⁵ The precise words used by the accused should be recorded, not merely the effect or a paraphrase of those words.¹

In drawing up a charge of perjury it is necessary to conform to the definition of the offence given in this section, and a charge that the accused made statements in their depositions "which they knew or had reason to know to be false", is incorrectly drawn, because a man makes a statement in the belief that it is true, though good reasons exist for knowing it to be false, for man's beliefs are not always influenced by good reasons.²

It is very irregular in a charge of intentionally giving false evidence to put the whole of a long statement bodily to a witness at once. A conviction on such a charge could be properly had only on proof that the accused person had made each and every statement contained in the document.³

The charge should specify not only the judicial proceeding in the course of which the prisoner is accused of having made the false statements, but the particular stage of the proceeding in which the statement is made.⁴ It should disclose the exact date on which the offence charged was committed, and the Court or officer before whom the false evidence was given.⁵ The object of specifying the offence and the occasion when the offence is committed is to give notice not only to the accused but also to the trying Court of specific offences against the accused.⁶

An alternative charge is justifiable only when the prosecution is wholly unable to prove which of the two contradictory statements made by the accused is false.⁷

Though a charge does not distinctly specify the false statement on which the evidence of perjury is attempted to be established, the omission is not material if the accused has not been prejudiced thereby.⁸

Different occasions.—Where the accused is charged with giving false evidence on different occasions, each occasion should form the subject of a distinct head in the charge.⁹

Central provinces Circular.—In prosecutions for giving false evidence, under ss. 193, 194 and 195 of the Indian Penal Code, the particular statements alleged to be false must invariably be set out in the charge, to enable the accused to understand fully the offence with which he stands charged.¹⁰

Form.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, in the course of the trial of —, before—, stated in evidence that (mention here the false statement) which statement you either knew or believed to be false, or did not believe to be true, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 193 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court)).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.¹¹

Punishment.—A false statement by a witness, as to his position or character ought not be punished so severely as a false charge on a false claim.¹²

A deliberate mis-statement made in a Court of Justice, whether it tends to endanger the life and property of others, or to defeat and impede the progress of justice is not an offence which should be lightly passed over. But for a simple mis-statement, from which no such inferences can be drawn, a comparatively light sentence will suffice, particularly where the accused pleads guilty and throws himself at the mercy of the Court.¹³

Where a person is convicted for making two contradictory statements (1) under s. 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, and (2) as a witness at the trial, and if it is not shown which of the two statements is false, the High Court will be slow to enhance the sentence passed by the lower Court.¹⁴

By the Frontier Crimes Regulation¹⁵ an offender convicted under ss. 193, 194, 195, 196, 201, 211 and 212 may be sentenced in lieu of or in addition to fine to be whipped, or to imprisonment not exceeding seven years, or to whipping and imprisonment not exceeding five years, or to transportation for not more than seven years.

Attempt.—The term of imprisonment for attempting to fabricate false evidence for the purpose of being sued in a stage of a judicial proceeding cannot extend beyond one-half of seven years.¹⁶

194. Whoever gives or fabricates false evidence, intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely¹ that he will thereby cause, any person to be convicted of an offence² which is capital by the law of British India or England,³ shall be punished with transportation for life, or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if an innocent person be convicted and executed in consequence of such false evidence, the person who gives such false evidence shall be punished either with death or the punishment hereinbefore described.

COMMENT.

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence of giving or fabricating false evidence made punishable by s. 193.

To constitute an offence under this section the accused must give false evidence intending thereby, that is, by giving such false evidence, to cause or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby, that is, by giving such false evidence, cause some person to be convicted of a capital offence. It is not necessary under this section that the false evidence which is given should be evidence given in a Court of Justice. Such statement, in the opinion of the Calcutta High Court, even if made to a police-officer, will amount to the offence of giving false evidence, provided the Court can infer that it was the intention of the accused to stick to the false evidence right up to the trial of the case.¹⁷ But the Bombay High Court has held that as the words "in any stage of a judicial proceeding" occurring in s. 193 are not repeated in this section, the latter, therefore, refers only to the final stage, that is, the trial of the case.¹⁸ Where an accused had, in a preliminary inquiry before a Magistrate, made a deposition in which he falsely stated that he had seen the persons charged before the Magistrate in the act of committing a murder, it was held that this section was inapplicable, as the natural consequence of such false evidence would be nothing graver than a committal of the persons charged to the Court of Session, and not necessarily a conviction, and it must be presumed that the accused intended the natural, that is, the ordinary consequences.¹⁹

1. 'Intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely'.—When the proceeding in which evidence is given is one in which a conviction is not possible, it is difficult to affirm that the accused had such intention or knowledge as is necessary under this section. A person giving false evidence before a Magistrate holding a preliminary inquiry into a charge of murder does not commit the offence under this section. He may be guilty under s. 193.²⁰ The offence of a person accusing another falsely of murder to a police-officer in an inquiry under s. 174 of the Criminal Procedure Code would not fall under this section, the reason being that it is difficult to affirm the existence of an intention to cause, or of knowledge, that the false evidence is likely to cause, a person to be convicted of a capital offence, when the proceeding in which the evidence is given is one in which such a conviction is not legally possible.²¹

Where a witness stated on oath before the Sessions Court, during the trial of the accused for murder, that another had committed the murder, whereas, before the Magistrate he had stated, as was the fact, that the accused had committed it, it was held that he was guilty under s. 193 and not under this section, as he did not know that he would cause a conviction for murder.²² Where the accused brought before a Court a witness whom he had tutored to tell a false story concerning a murder case before it, it was held that he was guilty under this section.²³

3. 'Capital by the law of British India or England'.—The following offences are punishable with death under the Penal Code :—

- (1) Waging war against the King (s. 121).
- (2) Abetting mutiny actually committed (s. 132).
- (3) Giving or fabricating false evidence upon which an innocent person suffers death (s. 194).
- (4) Murder (s. 302).
- (5) Abetment of suicide of a minor, or insane or intoxicated person (s. 305).
- (6) Dacoity accompanied with murder (s. 396).
- (7) Attempt to murder by a person under sentence of transportation, if hurt is caused (s. 307).

The following are capital offences under the English law :—

- (1) High treason.²⁴
- (2) Murder.²⁵
- (3) Piracy with violence.¹
- (4) Burning or destroying ships of war, arsenals, magazines, etc.²
- (5) Several offences relating to the army and navy.³

Amendment.—The words "by the law of British India or England" were substituted for the words "by this Code" by the Indian Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 149.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 193, and further—

That the accused, when giving or fabricating the same, intended thereby to cause, or knew that it was likely he would thereby cause, the person in question to be convicted of a capital offence under the Indian Penal Code, or under the English law.⁴

For the second clause prove further—

- (1) That capital punishment was carried into effect; and
- (2) That the person executed was an innocent person.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which such Court is subordinate, is required.⁵

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, in the course of the trial of——, before——, gave false evidence (or fabricated false evidence) intending thereby to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby cause)——to be convicted of the offence of——which by the law of British India (or England) is capital, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 194 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

Punishment.—As for whipping, see the Whipping Act (IV of 1909). As to the Frontier District, see the Frontier Crimes Regulation (III of 1901), ss. 11 (3) (d) and 12 (2).

195. Whoever gives or fabricates false evidence intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, any person to be convicted of an offence¹ which by the law of British India or England is not capital, but punishable with transportation for life, or imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards, shall be punished as a person convicted of that offence would be liable to be punished.

ILLUSTRATION.

A gives false evidence before a Court of Justice, intending thereby to cause Z to be convicted of a dacoity. The punishment of dacoity is transportation for life, or rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, with or without fine. A, therefore, is liable to such transportation or imprisonment, with or without fine.

COMMENT.

This section is similar to the preceding section except as regards the gravity of the offence in respect of which perjury is committed. It stands midway between s. 193 and s. 194.

1. 'Offence' means anything punishable under the Code or any special or local law (s. 40).

Amendment.—The words "by the law of British India or England" were substituted for the words "by this Code" by the Indian Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 149.

CASES.

Where the accused was convicted under this section for burning his house with the object of getting another convicted of the offence, and the act was done in a most open manner, and no complaint was made by the accused, it was held that the conviction could not be upheld, because there was no evidence of intention to convict.⁶ Where a person burnt his own house and charged another with the act, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section, but under s. 211.⁷ But where A, with a view of having B convicted, assisted in concealing stolen railway pins in his house and field, it was held that A was properly convicted of an offence under this section.⁸ Where false coins were made by the accused only for the purpose of passing them secretly into the house of his enemy in order to get him into trouble, it was held that he had committed an offence under this section also although he was guilty under s. 232 or 235.⁹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 193, and further—

That the accused, when giving or fabricating the same, intended thereby to cause, or knew that it was likely he would thereby cause, the person in question to be convicted of an offence punishable with transportation for life (or imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards) under the Indian Penal Code or the English law.¹⁰

To sustain a conviction it is not only necessary to prove that the accused spoke falsely, but also that he knew he was speaking falsely.¹¹

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.¹²

Charge.—Similar to one under s. 195 except that the offence is not capital but one punishable with transportation for life or imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards.

Punishment.—As for whipping, see the Whipping Act (IV of 1909). As to the Frontier District, see the Frontier Crimes Regulation (III of 1901).

COMMENT.

This section makes it an offence to corruptly use any evidence which the person using it knows to be false or fabricated. There must, therefore, be knowledge of its falsity and in addition the element of corruption.

The section applies to those who make use of such evidence as is made punishable by ss. 193, 194 and 195. "It must be read with ss. 191 and 192, and can only apply to the use of evidence which was false evidence within the meaning of s. 191 or fabricated evidence within the definition laid down in s. 192."¹³

The section may include also the case of suborning false witnesses and attempting to use their evidence. There must be a use or an attempt or offer to use the evidence in a judicial proceeding or on some other occasion.

The section does not apply to subornation of perjury. It must be shown that the accused made some use of the false evidence after it was in existence.¹⁴

If a person calls witnesses in support of a statement which he makes, and causes those witnesses to come into the box for the purpose of giving evidence which he knows to be untrue, and they give that evidence, and the jury find that they knew it to be untrue, that is evidence on which a jury may find that he solicited them; but the jury must be satisfied that he knew that the statement which they were called upon to make must be untrue to their own knowledge.¹⁵

1. 'Corruptly uses or attempts to use as true....evidence'.—The word 'corruptly' is applied to the doing of acts with the intent of gaining some advantage inconsistent with official duty or the rights of others.¹⁶ It is not intended to connote a motive necessarily connected with the passing of money as an inducement to the person impugned to use or attempt to use the fabricated evidence. An intention to procure a false conviction is a corrupt intention.¹⁷ The desire to screen an offender from the legal consequences of his act could well be designated a corrupt motive, and it would not require evidence to satisfy the Court that the witness in giving false evidence had that desire. The use of false evidence with the knowledge that it is false must ordinarily be corrupt from its very nature, and the onus lies on the accused to show that there are circumstances in the case which prevent its being corrupt. The fact that he was defending himself against a criminal charge is not enough. An accused person who uses fabricated evidence as genuine in his defence may be liable for using it corruptly. In support of an alibi on a charge of assault the accused produced a cattle-pound receipt and called the Patil of another village to prove that he was there at the time of the offence. The defence was not believed, and the accused was tried for corruptly using false evidence as true. It was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁸

The document should have been corruptly used or attempted to be used as true or genuine evidence. The production of a document in compliance with an order of the Court does not amount to using the document as genuine within the meaning of the section. Where during the pendency of a suit instituted for the cancellation of certain documents which was subsequently decreed, the defendants disclosed in their affidavit of documents the documents in question and later produced them on being called upon by the plaintiff to do so, it was held that such circumstance did not constitute a deliberate use of the documents by the defendants.¹⁹

The word 'corruptly' occurs in this section, and ss. 198, 200, 219 and 220. It is used to denote that those whose duty it is, not to judge of the credibility of evidence, but to submit it for the consideration of judicial and other functionaries, on behalf of their clients, do not incur the penalties for using false evidence.²⁰

The word 'corruptly' is not used in the sense of 'fraudulently' or 'dishonestly.' Where the accused used the evidence of a Hospital Assistant and a compounder for the purpose of producing the out-door Register of a dispensary containing false entries to the effect that he was present and treated there on certain days when in reality he was not, it was held that in order to bring him within the section there should have been evidence that the two witnesses had been induced to come forward by some corrupt motive, e.g., bribery.²¹

It is necessary to show that the evidence which the accused used or attempted to use as true or genuine was in existence at the time.²²

2. 'Any evidence which he knows to be false or fabricated.'—The word 'evidence' does not include a document. Where the accused used in a civil suit a document as genuine which he knew to be a forged document, it was held that he should be charged under s. 471 and not under this section.²³ Where a person used in Court false documents as true besides swearing to their authenticity, he was held guilty of this offence.²⁴ Where the accused produced as evidence an account book, one page of which had been fraudulently abstracted, and another substituted for it, it was held that he was not guilty of the offence of attempting to use, as genuine, fabricated evidence, unless he knew of the forgery and intended to use the forged evidence for the purpose of affecting the decision on the point at issue when the book was tendered.²⁵ A brought a suit upon a bond and at the trial sought to support his claim by a letter fabricated probably for the purpose of enabling him to get the bond registered. A was convicted under this section. It was held that if the letter was fabricated for use before the Registrar, it was no valid objection to the conviction.¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the piece of evidence in question is false or fabricated.

(2) That the accused used, or attempted to use, such false or fabricated piece of evidence.

(3) That he used, or attempted to use, such evidence, as true or genuine evidence.

(4) That when the accused used such evidence, or attempted to do so, he knew it to be false or fabricated.

(5) That when the accused so used, or attempted to do so, he acted corruptly.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable or not according as the offence of giving such evidence is bailable or not—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.² An order under s. 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code, directing a prosecution for offences under ss. 193 and 196 of the Code, amounts to a complaint under s. 260, Criminal Procedure Code, and the Court before making the order must hold an inquiry and must itself specify by its order (1) the witnesses to prove the complaint, (2) the false evidence complained against, and (3) whether the person complained against knew that the evidence which he was using as genuine was false.³

Charge.—The charge should contain the words "punishable under ss. 193 and 196 of the Indian Penal Code, etc.," as the section does not specify accurately the amount of punishment.⁴

Using, and attempting to use, false evidence are distinct offences and should be charged separately.⁵

Punishment.—As to the Frontier District, see the Frontier Crimes Regulation (III of 1901).

197. Whoever issues or signs any certificate required by law to be given or signed,¹ or relating to any fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence, knowing or believing that such certificate is false in any material point,² shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

Issuing or signing false certificate.

COMMENT.

Several laws require a certificate of some matter to be given. The offence of certifying in any of these, knowing or believing that the certificate is false, is put on the same footing as the offence of giving false evidence. In order to constitute an offence under this section the certificate must relate to any fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence.

The certificate must, however, be false in a material point. The issuing or signing of it must be by the officer, or person authorized to certify.

Ingredients.—This section has two essentials—

1. Issuing or signing of a certificate—

(a) required by law to be given or signed, or

(b) relating to a fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence.

2. Such certificate must have been issued or signed knowing or believing that it is false in any material point.

1. 'Issues or signs any certificate required by law to be given or signed.'—The word 'issues' means something different from using. It is the putting forth for the purpose of being used, and is preliminary to it.

'Certificate' is a testimony given in writing to declare or verify the truth of anything,⁶ e.g., a certificate of administration,⁷ of marriage,⁸ or adjustment of decrees,⁹ of incorporation of a company given by the registrar,¹⁰ or a certificate authorizing a judgment-debtor to mortgageland ordered to be sold,¹¹ or that a case is fit for appeal to the King in Council.¹² The word 'certificate' contemplates a certificate which is required by law to be given or signed for the purpose of being used in evidence in the course of administration of justice. The certificate given under the rule, viz. that in the case of female depositors withdrawing money from Post Office Savings Bank by their authorized agents under r. 18, the agent must sign a certificate on the application for withdrawal to the effect "certified that the depositor is on this day alive and sane," is not a certificate prescribed by the Government Savings Banks Act (V of 1873) or statutory rules made thereunder and such certificate is not a certificate within the meaning of this section.¹³

The word 'certificate' does not mean certification under this section and s. 198. The certificate, in respect of which a man may be punished under this section and s. 198, if it is false to his knowledge or belief, must be either one (a) that is required by law to be given or signed, or (b) that relates to any fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence without further proof. One or other of these requirements must be fulfilled before a man can be dealt with under this section and s. 198. A, purporting to represent a decree-holder in a certain suit, signed and filed a petition in the Court, stating, contrary to the fact, that B, the judgment-debtor, had paid off the decretal amount to the decree-holder through him. B was found to have abetted A in so doing. It was held that A was not guilty under this section and s. 198, and B could not be convicted for abetting, because a decree-holder is not bound to certify in writing a payment or adjustment of his decree.¹⁴ The accused in support of his defence produced a certificate granted by the Chairman of the Cuttack Municipality which was based on an entry in the Death Register and also, summoned the family astrologer to produce an almanac, to prove the date of his father's death. The Small Cause Court Judge found the date of death in the certificate to be incorrect and the accused was tried and convicted. It was held that the certificate in question was not a certificate contemplated by this section and s. 198 as it was a certificate not required by law to be given or signed.¹⁵ A medical certificate is not such a certificate as is contemplated in this section and the issue or use of a false medical certificate does not render a person liable under s. 197 or s. 198.¹⁶ A statement required in an application for change of name made under the Bengal Land Registration Act is not a certificate within the meaning of this section.¹⁷

'Required by law to be given or signed.'—Several Acts require the giving of certificates by various functionaries, e.g., the Christian Marriage Act (XV of 1872), ss. 17, 41, 61; the Indian Companies Act (VII of 1913), s. 262; the Indian Succession Act (XXXIX of 1925), s. 381; the Indian Registration Act (XVI of 1908), s. 60; the Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 2, 94; O. XLV, r. 3; the Administrator-General's Act (III of 1913), s. 31; the Legal Practitioners Act (XVIII of 1879), s. 7.

2. 'Knowing or believing that such certificate is false in any material point.'—The certificate must be false in respect of a material point. Falsity in any other respect will be of no avail.

Intent to injure.—Under this section proof of intent to cause injury is not necessary.¹⁸

CASES.

False declaration.—Where a person signed a notice of transfer of survey numbers in the character of his father who was dead, and the declaration to this notice was signed by the accused, who confirmed the assumed character, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section but could be convicted of giving false information to a public servant.¹⁹

Incorrect copy.—Where a copyist made an incorrect copy of a document filed with a record it was held that he had committed an offence under this section.²⁰

Abetment of issue of false certificate of summons.—Where there was no village-watchman in a village of the name appearing on the receipt acknowledging due service, the accused was acquitted in the absence of proof of guilty knowledge or belief, it being probable that he (an utter stranger in the village) was deceived by the villagers.²¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the document in question purports to be a certificate.

(2) That such certificate is required by law to be given or signed, or that it related to some fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence.

(3) That such certificate is false.

(4) That it is false in a material point.

(5) That the accused issued or signed the same.

(6) That he, when doing so, knew or believed, such certificate to be false.²²

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, issued (or signed) a certificate [required by law to be given (or signed)] (or) [relating to——a fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence] knowing or believing that such certificate is false in a material point, to wit——, and thereby committed an offence

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

198. Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use any such certificate¹ as a true certificate, knowing the same to be false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

Using as true a certificate known to be false.

COMMENT.

This section should be read along with s. 197.

It is connected with the last section just as s. 196 is connected with ss. 193, 194 and 195.

1. 'Any such certificate.'—The certificate must be one which is either "required by law to be given or signed" or "is by law admissible in evidence."²³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1), (2), (3) and (4) as in s. 197, and further—

(5) That such false certificate was signed or issued.

(6) That the accused used or attempted to use such false certificate.

(7) That he did so corruptly.

(8) That he, when using such false certificate, knew it to be false in a material point.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, corruptly used (or attempted to use) as true a certificate [required by law to be given and signed] (or) [relating to a fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence] but which is false in a material point, to wit——, and known by you to be the same, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 198 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance [or cognizance of the Court of Session].

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

199. Whoever, in any declaration made or subscribed by him, which declaration any Court of Justice, or any public servant or other person, is bound or authorized by law to receive as evidence¹ of any fact, makes any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true,² touching any point material to the object for which the declaration is made or used,³ shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

False statement made in declaration which is by law receivable as evidence.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section is intended to make the penalty attached to the offence of giving false evidence applicable to declarations which, although not compellable, have, on being made, the same effect as the compulsory declarations referred to in ss. 51 and 191.²⁴ It subjects any person who makes a false declaration, which declaration may be used as evidence of the matters stated in it, to the penalties for perjury. Section 191 deals with compulsory declarations, this section with false declarations made voluntarily, provided such declarations are capable of being used as evidence.

²³ See Prafulla Kumar Khara, [1942] 1 Cal. 573.

²⁴ A. Vedamuttu, (1868) 4 M. H. C. 185, 187.

Ingredients.—This section requires three essentials—

1. Making of a declaration which a Court or a public servant is bound or authorized by law to receive in evidence.
2. Making of a false statement in such declaration knowing or believing it to be false.
3. Such false statement should be touching any point material to the object for which the declaration is made or used.

1. 'Declaration made...which...any Court of Justice or any public servant or other person, is bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence.'—'Declaration'...means any statement of fact in the form simply of a declaration, which, for the purpose of proof of the fact declared to, has by itself all the legal force of evidence given on oath or the solemn affirmation substituted for an oath: in short, a declaration receivable in lieu of personal testimony.²⁵ A statement made by a witness in a criminal trial not upon oath or solemn affirmation is not a declaration.¹

See also Explanation to s. 200 as to the meaning of 'declaration.'

'Court of Justice.'—See s. 20, supra. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra.

'Bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence.'—A declaration must be one which is admissible in evidence, and which the Court before which it is filed is bound or authorized by law to receive in evidence.² It includes an affidavit in cases in which evidence may be given by affidavit.³ Where an identifier made a false affidavit, it was held that he was punishable under this section.⁴ A Sherishtadar of the Munsif's Court has power to act as the Commissioner of Oaths in respect of matters arising in the Court of the Additional Munsif, and a solemn declaration on affidavit made before him in respect of matters arising in the Court of the Additional Munsif is a legal declaration receivable in evidence in a Court of justice. Therefore, a person who swears a false affidavit, knowingly, before the Sheristadar of the Munsif's Court in respect of matters arising in the Court of the Additional Munsif is liable to be convicted under this section.⁵

A person making on oath a false statement in the nature of an affidavit in the course of a criminal proceeding before a Magistrate having no power to administer an oath;⁶ a person making a statement which is not evidence for him but against him,⁷ and a person in whose petition a false averment is made, such petition not being signed by himself but by his pleader,⁸ are held to have committed no offence under this section. A Hindu, who has become a convert to Christianity, is not under a legal obligation to speak the truth, unless his evidence be given under the sanction of an oath on the Holy Gospel.⁹ If the Court or public servant is not authorized by any provision of the law, or any rules having the force of law, to receive a declaration in evidence but does receive one, the person making it will not be liable.¹⁰ The accused made a false declaration before a Mamlatdar with a view to obtain a certificate of solvency for the purpose of securing a license from the Abkari authorities. It was held that no offence was committed under this section inasmuch as no Court or public servant was either bound or authorized by law to receive the declaration in evidence.¹¹ Similarly, where the accused reported falsely to a revenue surveyor that his father had died, in order to have his own name entered in the revenue register as owner of a certain garden and lands, it was held that he had committed an offence under s. 182 and not under this section.¹² Where a written statement was verified as required by the provisions of O. VI, r. 15, of the Civil Procedure Code, but the Court had not ordered proof of the statements made therein by affidavit under O. XIX, r. 1, nor had the statement of the applicant been recorded on oath in support of those allegations, it was held that an allegation in a written statement did not amount to a declaration which any Court of Justice was bound or authorized by law to receive as evidence of any fact and a conviction for an offence under this section in respect of merely an allegation was untenable.¹³ A Court cannot use any declarations as evidence unless they are of the nature of declarations contemplated in O. XIX, Civil Procedure Code. A verified statement which is not a declaration in the nature of an affidavit under the Order cannot form the basis of a conviction for an offence under this section.¹⁴

Statements in a verified insolvency petition under the Provincial Insolvency Act to the District Judge are not statements "bound or authorised by law to be received as evidence" within the meaning of this section, and as such a conviction under that section for any such false statement contained in such petition is illegal.¹⁵

2. 'Makes any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false.'—There must be a deliberate false statement. Statements made in a reckless and haphazard manner, though untrue in fact, do not constitute any offence when the person making them immediately admits the mistake and corrects them.¹⁶ If an applicant makes reckless allegations against a Magistrate in his affidavit in the High Court for a transfer of criminal proceedings against him he lays himself open to a prosecution under this section.¹⁷

3. 'Touching any point material to the object for which the declaration is made, etc.'—This provision as to proving materiality shows that the section has no reference to the examination of the witness in a judicial proceeding.¹⁸

Application for execution.—This section does not apply to applications for execution containing false averments.¹⁹

The Special Marriage Act, III of 1872.—Every person making, signing or attesting any declaration or certificate prescribed by this Act, containing a statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, shall be deemed guilty of the offence described in this section (s. 21). The offence contemplated in s. 21 of the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872) only deals with the declaration of a profession of want of belief in the Christian, Jewish, Hindu, Muhammadan, Parsi, Buddhist, Sikh, or Jain religion at the time when the declaration is made. A person may be born to parents professing one of these religions and may even have been practising the tenets of one of them up to the time of his marriage, but if at the time when he contracts a marriage under the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872) he makes a declaration that he does not profess any of these religions, then it cannot be said against him that, because he was born into the Christian, Jewish, Hindu, Muhammadan, Parsi, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain religion and had not formally renounced any of these religions before he made his declaration, he is guilty of an offence under this section. Where, therefore, there is no evidence adduced on behalf of the prosecution to show that when the accused made her declaration that she did not profess the Christian, Jewish, Hindu, Muhammadan, Parsi, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain religion, she was making any declaration which she knew to be false or believed to be false or did not believe to be true, she could not be convicted under s. 21 of the Special Marriage Act read with this section.²⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused made, or subscribed the declaration in question.

(2) That a Court of Justice, etc., was bound or authorized to receive such declaration as evidence.

(3) That the accused made the statement in question contained in such declaration.

(4) That such statement is false.

(5) That such false statement touched a point material to the object of such declaration.

A conviction for an offence under this section may be passed primarily on circumstantial evidence.²²

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.²³ There must be proper materials before an action is taken.²⁴

Charge.—The accused is entitled to know the exact words which are alleged to have been used by him and which are sought to be made the subject of a charge of perjury.²⁵

The charge should run thus :—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, in a declaration made (or subscribed) by you before——, made a false statement, which you knew (or believed) to be false (or did not believe to be true), touching a point material to the object for which the declaration was made, to wit——, and which declaration was by law receivable as evidence, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 199 of the Indian Penal Code and within [my cognizance] (or) [cognizance of the Court of Session].

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

200. Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use as true any

Using as true such declaration knowing it to be false.

such declaration, knowing the same to be false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

Explanation.—A declaration which is inadmissible merely upon the ground of some informality, is a declaration within the meaning of sections 199 and 200.

COMMENT.

This section bears the same relation to the last section as s. 198 does to s. 197 or s. 196 to ss. 193, 194 and 195. The person who uses a false declaration is made liable as one who makes it.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the declaration is false.

(2) That a Court of Justice, etc., was bound or authorized by law to receive the same in evidence.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.¹

Charge.—See s. 199.

Punishment.—As for whipping, see the Whipping Act (IV of 1909).

201. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed,¹ causes any evidence of the commission of that offence to disappear, with the intention of screening the offender² from legal punishment, or with that intention gives any information respecting the offence which he knows or believes to be false,³ shall, if the offence which he knows or believes to have been committed is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with transportation for life, or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment for any term not extending to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of the imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, knowing that B has murdered Z, assists B to hide the body with the intention of screening B from punishment. A is liable to imprisonment of either description for seven years, and also to fine.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section relates to the disappearance of any evidence of the commission of an offence, and includes also the giving of false information with the intention of screening an offender. Sections 202 and 203 relate to the giving or omitting to give such information, and s. 204, to the destruction of documentary evidence. There are three groups of sections in the Code relating to the giving of information. Firstly, ss. 118-120 deal with concealment of design to commit an offence; secondly, ss. 176, 177, 181, 182 deal with omission to give information and with giving of false information; and, thirdly, ss. 201-203 deal with causing disappearance of evidence.

This section is intended to reach acts to which ss. 193-195 do not extend, and not to include acts falling under those sections.² This section is an attempt to define the position known in English law as that of an accessory after the fact. It is settled law that a principal cannot be convicted as an accessory after the fact.³

Principle.—Whenever an offence has actually been committed, any person knowing or having reason to believe that it has been committed, and intending to screen the offender from legal punishment, (a) causes any evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear, or (b) gives any information respecting the offence which he knows or believes to be false, shall be punishable under this section.

Scope.—This section presumably contains the principle of the English law that a principal cannot be convicted as an accessory after the fact; the word “offender” in the section refers to an offender other than the accused person himself.

The Bombay High Court has held that a person cannot be convicted, under this section, of causing evidence of the commission of an offence by himself to disappear, nor can he be convicted of the abetment of such an act.⁴ A conviction of the accessory offence under this section is, however, not illegal merely because it is suspected, but not proved or admitted, that the accused committed or was one of several persons who committed the principal offence.⁵ A person can be charged with the offence of murder, and, in the alternative, with the offence of causing evidence to disappear with the intention of screening the offender.⁶

The Allahabad High Court has held, differing from its earlier decisions, that a person who has actually committed a crime himself is none the less guilty of removing traces thereof, if it is proved against him that he has done so, because he was the person who actually committed the offence.⁷ Where it is not established by the evidence on the record that a person is the murderer or one of the murderers, although there are circumstances of grave suspicion that he is such and he was charged as being such, his conviction under this section of the offence of causing evidence of the murder to disappear is not vitiated by the existence of such circumstances.⁸ The mere fact that the accused is probably or possibly the principal offender does not prevent his conviction under this section.⁹ Where an accused person has been acquitted of a charge of committing a crime, the fact that he had been suspected and tried for the principal offence would not prevent his conviction under this section, if there is clear proof that he has caused evidence to disappear in order to screen some unknown offender from legal punishment.¹⁰

The Calcutta High Court was once of the opinion that this section applies merely to the person who screens the principal or actual offender, and not to the principal or actual offender himself.¹¹ But it has laid down subsequently that where, notwithstanding circumstances of grave suspicion, it is impossible on the record to hold that a person is a murderer, his conviction under this section or s. 203 is not vitiated by the existence of such circumstances.¹² In view of the Privy Council ruling in *Begu v. The King Emperor*¹³ the earlier Calcutta decisions are no longer of any authority. In the Privy Council case five persons were charged under s. 302 with murder, and two of them were convicted. The evidence established that the other three had assisted in removing the body, knowing that a murder had been committed. Without any further charge being made, they were convicted under this section of causing the disappearance of evidence. It was held that the conviction without a further charge having been made was warranted by s. 237 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The Calcutta High Court has now held that in a trial of charges under ss. 302 and 201, there is no legal bar to an acquittal under s. 302 and conviction under this section.¹⁴

The Madras High Court has held that ss. 201 to 203 are applicable to a person who is guilty of the main offence, though in practice a Court will not convict an accused both of the main offence and under these sections.¹⁵ Where two persons, charged with murder and with causing the disappearance of evidence with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment under s. 302 and this section, are acquitted under s. 302 on the ground that the evidence is not sufficient to establish that both of them took such part in causing the death as would justify the conviction of each of them of murder, they can be convicted under this section, even though the Court is of opinion that one or other of them, if not both, must have committed the murder. Neither the circumstance that neither of them has been convicted of the main offence nor the fact that the Court is not satisfied that they are innocent of the main offence is a bar to the conviction under this section. Where it is impossible to say definitely that a person has committed the principal offence, he cannot escape conviction under this section merely because he has been charged also with the principal offence, or because there are grounds for suspicion that he might be the principal culprit.¹⁶ The recovery of the body of a person murdered on its being pointed out by the accused would be very strong evidence of an offence under this section.¹⁷

The Patna High Court once expressed the view that this section does not relate to the principal offender but to persons other than the actual criminal who, by causing the evidence of the offence to disappear, assist the principal to escape the consequences of his crime. Where, however, it is impossible to say definitely that a person has committed the principal offence, he cannot escape conviction under this section merely because he has been charged also with the principal offence or because there are grounds for suspicion that he might be the principal culprit.¹⁸ Subsequently the Patna High Court adopted the view of the Allahabad and the Madras High Courts holding that a person who has actually committed a crime himself cannot be said to be any the less guilty of removing traces thereof, if it is proved against him that he has done so, because he was the person who actually committed the offence. In practice no Court will convict an accused both of the main offence and under this section. But if the commission of the main offence is not brought home to him, then he can be convicted under this section.¹⁹ In a recent case, in which this decision has not been referred to, Rowland, J., has held that there is no law preventing the main offender being convicted under this section, and s. 203, but in practice no Court will convict an accused both of the main offence and under these sections. But Shearer, J., holds that a person who, having committed an offence, subsequently causes evidence of the commission of that offence to disappear, does not, in so doing, commit another separate and distinct offence for which the Courts have in strict law jurisdiction to impose a separate punishment.²⁰

The Lahore High Court has followed the Calcutta High Court and held that this section applies merely to the person who screens the principal or actual offender and not to the principal or actual offender himself.²¹ But where the disposal of a body is a separate transaction from the actual murder, the conviction of the principal offender under this section in addition to the conviction under s. 302 is not illegal.²²

1. 'Knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed'.—It must be proved that an offence, the evidence of which the accused is charged with causing to disappear, has actually been committed;²³ and that the accused knew, or had information sufficient to lead him to believe, that the offence had been committed.²⁴ "Under the Penal Code no man can be tried for any delusion or misconception of mind, however culpable and criminal such delusion or misconception may appear to be".²⁵ "The terms used in the section 'knowing or having reason to believe' conclusively negative and preclude the view that its provisions are applicable in cases in which an offence has not been committed. For it is impossible for anyone to know or to have reason, or sufficient cause, to believe that an offence has been committed when it has not been committed. A person may fancy that he knows or has reason to believe an offence to have been committed when it has not been committed, but he is mistaken in so fancying. He may, under the influence of such a mistake, remove something which he imagines to be evidence of the offence which he supposes to have been committed, and he may be morally blamable for so doing. But it is beyond the province of criminal legislation to punish a man for a delusion, or even for an act which has not caused any actual harm to the public or any individual member of society".¹

As to the word 'offence' see Explanation to s. 203, infra.

2. 'Causes any evidence of the commission of that offence to disappear, with the intention of screening the offender'.—The expression 'any evidence of the commission of that offence' clearly refers, not to evidence in the extensive sense in which that word is used in the Indian Evidence Act, but to evidence in its primary sense as meaning anything that is likely to make the crime evident such as the existence of a wounded corpse, or blood stains, fabricated documents or similar material objects indicating that an offence has been committed. The statements of a witness and panchnamas do not constitute such evidence.² Removal of the corpse of a murdered man from the place of murder to another place is not causing the disappearance of some evidence of commission of the murder and thus does not come under this section which requires the causing the disappearance of some evidence of the commission of an offence.³ The act committed must have been done with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment: mere knowledge that it is likely to do so is not sufficient.⁴ A person cannot be convicted of screening an offender when the offender himself has been tried and acquitted of the offence,⁵ or when the offence is that of suicide.⁶ It is not necessary that the accused should be aware of the identity of the offender whom he intends to screen.⁷ Nor need the offender himself have been convicted.⁸ A person who secretly buries the headless body of a man just murdered is prima facie guilty under this section unless he can establish that his act was innocent.⁹ A burial of a corpse of a murdered man if done with the intention of concealing the fact that there were marks of violence on it is an offence under this section.¹⁰ Where the only evidence against the accused is the production of the corpse and the presence of motive to commit murder, a conviction under this section is maintainable.¹¹ Where it appeared from the statement of the accused that he took from the man who, according to him, committed the murder, a jewel which was unquestionably the property of the deceased and he hid it and produced it later, it was held that the accused, when he hid the jewel, had the intention of screening the offender, whoever he was, from legal punishment, and so was guilty of an offence under this section.¹²

Where there is clear and independent proof that a person has caused evidence to disappear in order to screen some person or persons unknown, the fact that he had been tried and acquitted of the offence of murder would not, in itself, prevent his conviction under this section.¹³

Where a person, through fear, did not interpose to prevent the commission of a murder, and afterwards helped the murderers, in concealing the body, it was held that he was not guilty of abetment of murder, but was guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁴ A person who assists the actual murderers in removing the corpse of their victim to a distance from the place where the murder was committed is guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁵ But where the accused was ordered by her husband to help him to remove the dead body of a murdered man, it was held that she was not guilty under this section as her acts were not voluntary nor done with the intention of screening the offender from punishment.¹⁶ Where the accused, finding in her house the dead body of a girl, who had been murdered by her son, locked the outer door without moving the corpse or concealing it, it was held that she was not guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁷ Where the only acts proved against the first accused were that he caught hold of the tuft of the deceased before the second accused fatally stabbed him and that he took part in subsequently tying the deceased with a rope and dragging him along for some distance, it was held that the acts proved did not render the first accused liable to be convicted for an offence under this section.¹⁸

The weapon with which an offence is committed is a very valuable piece of evidence of its commission. The blood-stained weapon in a murder case affords a primary evidence of the offence and not an evidence in the extensive sense in such a case, and if a person conceals that weapon with a view to screen the offender, he thereby commits an offence under this section.¹⁹

Keeping out of way witness to commission of offence.—Where the accused having reason to believe that a murder had been committed and that B, the wife of the murdered man, was aware of the fact, took B away from the village where it was likely that inquiries would be made, and kept her out of the way lest she should give information, it was held that the taking of measures to keep a person out of the way who was possessed of knowledge of the occurrence of a crime and who was likely to communicate that knowledge to others, did not amount to causing disappearance of evidence within the meaning of the law.²⁰

3: 'Gives any information respecting the offence which he knows or believes to be false'.—The information need not be given to the police or the Magistrate and it is immaterial whether that information was volunteered or given in reply to enquiries.²¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that an offence has been committed.²² Mere remour or suspicion is not sufficient.²³

(2) That the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that such offence had been committed.²⁴

(3) That the accused caused evidence thereof to disappear; or gave false information respecting such offence, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be false.²⁵

(4) That the accused did as in (3) with intent to screen the offender from legal punishment.¹

The following must be proved as an aggravating circumstance :—

(5) That the offence in question was punishable with death, or transportation for life, or with imprisonment extending to ten years.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, in cases falling under the first clause; by Court of Session, or Presidency Magistrate, or first class Magistrate, in cases falling under the second; and by Magistrate, Presidency or first class, or by Court by which the offence is triable in cases falling under the third.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, knowing (or having reason to believe) that certain offence, to wit—, punishable with—, has been committed, did cause certain evidence of the said offence to disappear, to wit—, [or knowingly gave false information, to wit—] with the intention of screening the said (name of the person committing the offence) from legal punishment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 201 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

Punishment.—As to the Frontier District, see the Frontier Crimes Regulation (III of 1901). •

For the purpose of calculating the punishment to be awarded under this section, it is necessary for the Court to decide not so much what offence—the evidence of which has been concealed—has been committed, as what offence the accused knew or had reason to believe had been committed.²

202. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed,¹ intentionally omits to give any information respecting that offence which he is legally bound² to give, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Intentional omission to give information of offence by person bound to inform.

COMMENT.

This section punishes the illegal omissions of those who are by some law bound to give information, when such omissions are intentional. It is analogous to s. 176. The offence under it will generally be committed by public servants and private persons bound to give information under ss. 44 and 45 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

1. 'Knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed'.—Under this section, where the corpus delicti is not established, there can be no conviction for intentional omission to give information respecting an offence which has not been proved to have been committed.³

As to the definition of 'offence', see Explanation to s. 203, infra.

Where a Police Patel failed to report the arrival at his village of dacoits and supplied them with food and drink, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section as there was nothing to show that an offence was committed by persons who visited the village.⁴ Where, from the fact of the Police Patel ordering the kulkarni to write a report regarding a suspicious death in his village, his good faith was apparent, and it did not appear that he had an intention to omit the report, it was held illegal to convict him of an intention to evade the law about the first report.⁵

2. 'Legally bound'.—See s. 43, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the offence, which was not informed about, has been committed.⁶

(2) That the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that such offence had been committed.⁷

See Criminal Procedure Code, ss. 44, 45.

203. Whoever,¹ knowing or having reason to believe² that an offence has been committed,³ gives any information respecting that offence which he knows or believes to be false,⁴ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.—In sections 201 and 202 and in this section the word 'offence' includes any act committed at any place out of British India, which, if committed in British India, would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460..

COMMENT.

Principle.—A person who knowing that an offence has been committed volunteers information which he knows or believes to be false, obstructs justice, and is therefore punished whether any intention to screen the offender can be proved against him or not, and whatever be the offence which the latter has committed.

Object.—The object of the Legislature is not to insure general veracity or the making of correct statements in regard to supposed offences, or offences the commission of which might be falsely or incorrectly reported, but to discourage and punish the giving of false information to the police in regard to offences which were actually committed, and which the person charged knew, or had reason to believe, had been actually committed.⁹

1. 'Whoever'.—That is, a person other than the offender.

2. 'Reason to believe'.—See s. 26, supra. A belief that an offence has very probably been committed is not enough.

3. 'An offence has been committed'.—It must be proved not only that the person charged had reason to believe that the offence had actually been committed, but that the offence had actually been committed, and that the accused knew or had reason to believe that such an offence had actually been committed.¹⁰

The word 'offence' here denotes a thing punishable under the Code or any special or local law (s. 40).

4. 'Gives any information... which he knows or believes to be false'.—The wilful giving of false information in respect of the commission of an offence is made punishable. The expression "gives information" means volunteers information.¹¹

Where, notwithstanding circumstances of grave suspicion, it is impossible on the record, as it stands, to hold that a person is the murderer or one of the murderers, his conviction under this section for giving false information is not vitiated by the existence of such circumstances.¹²

Where a body was found with wounds on the neck and throat which indicated that the deceased had met with foul play, and a village watchman having inspected the body informed at the thana that the deceased had died of cholera and there was nothing suspicious in the appearance of the body, he was held guilty of an offence under this section.¹³

Statement to police.—This section does not apply to the case of a person who gives false evidence as a witness to the police in the course of their investigation in reply to questions put to him. It only contemplates information volunteered by some person. Where the accused, while being examined by the police in answer to questions put to him, falsely stated that certain persons had committed theft and melted stolen property, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section.¹⁴

Explanation.—The Explanation to this section was added by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (III of 1894), s. 7.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that an offence has been committed.

(2) That the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that such offence had been committed.

(3) That he gave the information.

(4) That such information was with respect to that offence.

(5) That the information so given is false.

(6) That when he gave such information he knew or believed it to be false.¹⁵

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, knowing that on or about the——day of——, at——, the offence of——was committed by——gave information respecting the said offence, to wit——, which you knew or believed to be false, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 203 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

204. Whoever secretes or destroys any document¹ which he may be lawfully compelled to produce as evidence in a Court of Justice,² or in any proceeding lawfully held before a public servant,³ as such, or obliterates or renders illegible the whole or any part of such document with the intention of preventing the same from being produced or used as evidence⁴ before such Court or public servant as aforesaid, or after he shall have been lawfully summoned or required to produce the same for that purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Destruction of document to prevent its production as evidence.

COMMENT.

This section may be compared with s. 175 as it is merely an aggravated form of the offence described in that section.

Scope.—The section applies whether the proceeding is of a civil or criminal nature. Special and local laws requiring production of documents and containing penalties for destruction or obliteration of such documents are not affected by it.

1: 'Secretes or destroys any document'.—See s. 29, supra, as to the definition of 'document'. A person may secrete a document not only when the existence of the document is unknown to other persons and for the purpose of preventing the existence of the document coming to the knowledge of anybody, but also when the existence of the document is known to others. But it is not necessarily enough to show that, upon an occasion on which it became his duty to produce the document, he failed to discharge that duty, though it may be a cogent piece of evidence. The fact that a man perjures himself by denying the existence of a document which, to his knowledge, is in his custody would be a still more cogent piece of evidence.¹⁶

Secreting document.—Where the plaintiff in a suit referred to arbitration by consent, with a view to prevent a witness from referring to an endorsement on a bond, snatched up the bond which was lying beside the arbitrator, ran away, and refused to produce it, it was held that he had committed this offence.¹⁷

Destroying document.—Where a police-officer took down at first the report of the commission of dacoity made to him, but subsequently destroyed that report and framed another and a false report of the commission of a totally different offence, he was held guilty of this offence.¹⁸ He had secreted or destroyed the first signed report.

The accused, a police-officer, drew up a panchnama and had it signed by a punch. But finding that it was disfigured by interlineations and scratches, he had the document fairly written out again in textually the same form and had it signed by the same punch. The rough document was thereupon destroyed. For doing this act, the accused was convicted of an offence punishable under this section. It was held that the accused had committed no offence under it, for the fair document which he preserved and ultimately presented to the Court must be regarded as the only document which he was lawfully compelled to produce as evidence; and the former writing must be regarded merely as rough notes designed for the preparation of the fair document.¹⁹

The complainant purported to have committed an offence under s. 477, by wilfully and dishonestly destroying two documents, one said to be a written contract, by which the complainant's firm sold to the accused or to his firm certain quantity of shellac, and another spoken of sometimes as a tender and sometimes as a delivery order bearing endorsement in favour of the complainant's firm made by a certain person. It was held that if the documents were found not to be valuable security within the meaning of s. 477, still this section was applicable to the case.²⁰

2. 'Court of Justice.'—See s. 20, supra. 3. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra.

4. 'With the intention of preventing the same from being produced... as evidence.'—The act must have been done with the intention of preventing the document from being produced or used as evidence. Where a putwari was convicted under this section for destroying a leaf out of the Register of Mutations of a village which he might be lawfully compelled to produce in evidence, the conviction was set aside.²¹

There is no question here of the materiality of the evidence. Whether material or not, it must not be secreted or destroyed to evade production in a judicial or other proceeding, if the production may be lawfully compelled.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused secreted or destroyed the document; or that he obliterated, or rendered illegible, the whole, or any part of such document.

(2) That he was lawfully compellable to produce the same as evidence (a) in a Court of Justice; or (b) in proceedings lawfully held by a public servant.

(3) That he did as in (1), with the intention of preventing the same from being produced or used as such evidence; or that he did as in (1) after he had been lawfully summoned or required to produce the same for that purpose.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

205. Whoever falsely personates¹ another, and in such assumed character² makes any admission or statement, or confesses judgment, or causes any process to be issued or becomes bail or security, or does any other act in any suit or criminal prosecution,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

False personation for purpose of act or proceeding in suit or prosecution.

COMMENT.

The offence punishable under this section is not merely cheating by using a fictitious name, but by falsely assuming to become other real person and in that character making an admission, confessing judgment, or causing any process to be issued, etc.

The offence of false personation is dealt with in ss. 140, 170, 171, 171D, 416 and this section.

1. 'Personates.'—Personation is an assumption of the name and character of another, a pretence of being another. To 'personate' means to pretend to be a particular person.²²

Where A personated B at a trial with B's consent, which was given to save himself from the trouble of making an appearance in person before the Magistrate, it was held that A was guilty of an offence under this section, and B was guilty of abetment.²³ Where A presented a petition in the name of B who was ill, it was held that A was not guilty, because the mere fact as above disclosed was insufficient to show any intention on the part of A to falsely personate B.²⁴ Where a person was charged and convicted under this section for falsely personating himself as a servant of one H and as such causing a notice under s. 158B of the Bengal Tenancy Act to be served on H by writing before the civil Court process-server "apne malik ke nam ka notice paia", it was held that the conviction was bad inasmuch as it was not a case of falsely personating another person within the meaning of this section.²⁵

2. 'Assumed character.'—It is necessary that the accused should have assumed the name and character of the person he is charged with having personated.¹

3. 'Any suit or criminal prosecution.'—Proceedings under the Indian Succession Act are not acts in any suit within the meaning of this section. A false personation during such proceedings is not punishable under this section.² A prosecution under Act III of 1852 is a criminal prosecution within the meaning of this section.³

Fraudulent gain.—This offence is committed, even though the individual personated consents to the personation. Any fraudulent gain or benefit to the offender is not an essential element of this offence.⁴

Personation of imaginary person.—There is a conflict of decisions on the point whether a person commits an offence under this section by personating a purely imaginary person. The Calcutta High Court has in an old case held that a person by such personation commits this offence.⁵ The Madras High Court, dissenting from the above ruling, has held that "it is not enough to shew the assumption of a fictitious name. It must also, we think, appear that the assumed name was used as a means of falsely representing some other individual. It is not an uncommon thing for men to pass under names not their own for the purpose of disguise, in some instances from blameless, and in other instances indifferent or bad motives—'incog.' as the disguise is often termed in the former, and 'with or under an alias' in the latter instances. But whatever the motive, the use of an assumed name without more is not a criminal offence. It only becomes a crime when connected by proof with some other act or piece of conduct; and the gist of the offence of false personation under s. 205, we think, is the feigning to be another known person... There are sections of the Penal Code, under which the false assumption of appearance or character may be an offence, though no individual is meant to be represented, or only an imaginary person. Such are the ss. 140, 170, 171 and 416, but they have no application to the present case, and the last section is made applicable to personation of an imaginary person by an express enactment."⁶

According to the English law such an assumption of an imaginary person does not amount to an offence. One Robert Martin, in payment for a pony and cart purchased by him from the prosecutor, drew a cheque in the name of William Martin, in the presence of the prosecutor upon a bank at which he had no account, and gave it to the prosecutor as his own cheque drawn in his own name. At the time he drew the cheque he knew that it would be dishonoured. It was held that he was not guilty of forgery.⁷

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused falsely personated the person in question.

(2) That he made the admission, etc.

(3) That he made such admission, etc., in such assumed character.

(4) That such admission, etc., was made in a suit or a criminal prosecution.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.⁸

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, falsely personated (name) in (specify the suit or criminal proceeding) before (office of Judge) and in such assumed character (specify the admission of statement made, or judgment confessed, or process caused to be issued, or bail or security given, or any other act done), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 205 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.⁹

shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section and ss. 207 and 208 have the effect of rendering criminal all collusive modes by which creditors, or lawful claimants, may be defeated of their just remedies. Sections 421-424 deal with fraudulent transfers.

The concealment or removal of property contemplated in this section must be to prevent the property from being taken. Where the property is already taken and the removal is subsequent, no offence under this section is committed.¹⁰

Object.—The section awards a punishment for fraudulently removing or concealing property to prevent its seizure as a forfeiture in satisfaction of a fine or from being taken in execution of a decree. The Law Commissioners observe : “If...it is an offence against justice in a culprit to escape from custody in order to avoid execution of a sentence of imprisonment, and an offence to harbour or assist him, and that such offences are fit subjects of punishment, we think he [Mr. Norton] ought to allow upon the same grounds that the removal or concealment of property, or any dealing with it in order to prevent the execution of a sentence, of fine, for example, instead of imprisonment, is an offence against justice and a fit subject of punishment.”¹¹

Scope.—A civil suit must be actually pending before a Court and not merely intended to be filed, before a person can prosecute another under this section and s. 207 for a fraudulent transfer of property likely to be taken in execution of the civil decree that is passed or likely to be passed.¹²

1. ‘Whoever.’—The offence may be committed by any one and not necessarily by the owners of the property.

2. ‘Fraudulently.’—There must be a fraudulent removal, sale, or transfer of property, or of some interest therein, intending thereby to prevent that property from being taken as a forfeiture or in satisfaction of a fine.¹³ If the act of the accused is dishonest but not fraudulent, no offence is committed under this section. Where the accused, who was guardian of the judgment-debtor, forestalling the action of the Court in sending its official to harvest the crop which was attached, on behalf of a decree-holder, went openly to the field and harvested the crop himself, it was held that he was not guilty of an offence under this section as his act was dishonest but not fraudulent.¹⁴

There is nothing to prevent a judgment-debtor from disposing of his interest in an attached debt. The Court should not presume a fraudulent intention because he does what he is entitled to do.¹⁵ A person who, to protect his own property not legally liable for the decree from confusion with property which is so liable, makes it over to another person, does not commit an offence under this section.¹⁶ A person who fraudulently removes property, intending thereby to prevent that property from being taken in execution of a decree made by a Collector, commits an offence under this section.¹⁷ Where the accused forcibly cut the crops and removed them in spite of the remonstrances of a peon, and there was no trace of any fraudulent removal or concealment, no offence under this section was held to have been committed.¹⁸

As to the definition of ‘fraudulently’, see s. 25, supra.

3. ‘Removes.’—The cutting and carrying of crops, which the accused knew to be under attachment, in execution of a certificate under the Public Demands Recovery Act,¹⁹ was held to be an offence under the latter part of this section.²⁰

4. 'Transfers.'—This word is not defined in the Code, but it has the same meaning as 'transfer of property' defined in s. 5 of the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882. 'Transfer of property' means an act by which a living person conveys property, in present or in future, to one or more other living persons, and 'to transfer property' is to perform such act. A creditor commits no fraud, who anticipates other creditors and obtains a discharge of his debt by the assignment of any property, which has not already been attached by another creditor.²¹ Similarly, the assignment by the decree-holder of a decree obtained upon the basis of a debt which is under attachment does not per se amount to the commission of this offence inasmuch as such assignment cannot affect the rights of the attaching creditors.²² Where the accused, who was judgment-debtor, gave an undertaking to the executing Court not to alienate certain property pending the disposal of a claim petition but immediately thereafter executed a registered deed of conveyance transferring the property to his own son and he was thereupon prosecuted for an offence under this section, it was held that the object of the transfer by the accused in breach of his undertaking was to deceive his creditor, that the ingredient of secrecy was not negated by reason of the registration of the deed of transfer, and that the accused was liable to be convicted for an offence under this section.²³

5. 'From being taken as a forfeiture.'—The word 'taken' has been used in the sense of 'seized' or 'taken possession of.'²⁴ The forfeiture must be under a sentence pronounced by a Court of Justice or other competent authority. The distraint of property by a Collector in the collection of land revenue cannot be described as forfeiture under a sentence pronounced or likely to be pronounced. Two tents were distrained under the orders of a revenue authority for the recovery of an arrear of land revenue, and were committed to the care of the accused. When the time fixed for the sale of the property arrived, the accused produced two other tents of inferior value and concealed or removed those distrained. It was held that they were not guilty under this section.²⁵

6. 'Court of Justice.'—See s. 20, supra.

7. 'From being taken in execution of a decree or order.'—The words "taken in execution" mean something equivalent to appropriated towards execution or utilised effectively in aid of execution. Where cattle were attached in execution of a decree and the accused removed them from the possession of the complainant, in whose possession the cattle had been left, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section and s. 379.¹ But the mere harvesting of attached crops by a judgment-debtor will not bring him within the scope of this section, unless it is shown that he did it with the fraudulent intention of preventing crops from being taken in execution of the decree and not merely with the idea of saving them.²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the sentence of fine had been, or was, to the knowledge of the accused, likely to be, pronounced; or that the decree or order had been, or was, to the knowledge of the accused, likely to be, made.

(2) That it was a Court of Justice or other competent authority pronouncing or about to pronounce such sentence; or that it was a Court of Justice making or about to make such decree or order in a civil suit.

(4) That the accused removed, concealed, transferred or delivered such property or interest therein with intent thereby to prevent such property from being taken.

(5) That he did as above with intent to defraud.

COMMENT.

This section deals with the receiver, acceptor, or claimer of property to prevent its seizure as a forfeiture. It punishes the accomplice just as the preceding section punishes the principal offender.

1. 'Whoever.'—See s. 206, supra.
2. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra.
3. 'Court of Justice.'—See s. 20, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the sentence of fine had been, or was, to the knowledge of the accused, likely to be, pronounced; or that the decree or order had been, or was, to his knowledge, likely to be, made:

(2) That it was a Court of Justice, or other competent authority, pronouncing, or about to pronounce, such sentence; or that it was a Court of Justice making, or about to make, such decree or order in a civil suit.

(4) That the accused accepted, received or claimed such property or interest with intent to defraud; or that he practised a deception touching the right thereto.

(5) That he then had no right or rightful claim thereto.

(6) That he then knew he had no right or rightful claim thereto.

(7) That he did as above in order to prevent such property or interest from being so taken.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.⁴

208. Whoever¹ fraudulently² causes or suffers a decree or order to be passed against him at the suit of any person for a sum not due, or for a larger sum than is due to such person or for any property or interest in property to which such person is not entitled, or fraudulently causes or suffers a decree or order to be executed against him after it has been satisfied,³ or for anything in respect of which it has been satisfied, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

ILLUSTRATION.

A institutes a suit against Z. Z, knowing that A is likely to obtain a decree against him fraudulently suffers a judgment to pass against him for a larger amount at the suit of B, who has no just claim against him, in order that B, either on his own account or for the benefit of Z, may share in the proceeds of any sale of Z's property which may be made under A's decree. Z has committed an offence under this section.

COMMENT.

This section prevents the abuse of getting some one to file a collusive suit for recovery of the whole property and suffering a decree to be passed. It punishes persons making fictitious claims in order to secure the property of the defendant against persons to whom he may become indebted in future.

1. 'Whoever.'—See s. 206, supra.
2. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra. Fraud is the essence of the offence under this section.
3. 'Satisfied.'—See s. 210, infra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused, or suffered, the decree or order to be passed against him.

(2) That such decree or order was for a sum not due by the accused; or for a sum larger than was due; or for property or interest therein to which the decree-holder was not entitled.

(3) That the accused did as in (1) with intent to defraud.

Or prove the following points :—

(1) That a decree against the accused had been satisfied.

(2) That he, afterwards, caused or suffered such decree or order to be executed against him.

(3) That such execution was for that in respect of which it had been so satisfied.

(4) That the accused did as above with intent to defraud.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.⁵

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, fraudulently caused (or suffered) a decree (or order), to wit—, in Suit No.—of the Court of—

to be passed against you, and which was for a sum not due [or for a larger sum than is due] to such person or for any property or interest in property to which the decree-holder was not entitled or fraudulently caused (or suffered) a decree (or order), to wit—, decree No.—, in Suit No.—, decided by the Court—on—, to be executed against you after it had been satisfied, and thereby committed an offence under s. 208 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

209. Whoever fraudulently¹ or dishonestly,² or with intent to injure³ or annoy any person,⁴ makes in a Court of Justice⁵ any claim which he knows to be false,⁶ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

This section relates to false and fraudulent claims in a Court of Justice.⁶ It is much wider than the last section as it applies to a person who is acting fraudulently or dishonestly. Not only the claim must be false within the knowledge of the person making it, but the object of it must be to defraud, to cause wrongful loss or wrongful gain, to injure or to annoy. The section punishes the making of a false claim. The offence will be complete as soon as a suit is filed. If a person applies for the execution of a decree which has already been executed, his act is an offence under the next section.

1. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra. 2. 'Dishonestly.'—See s. 24, supra.

3. 'Injure.'—See s. 44, supra.

4. 'Any person.'—It is not necessary that the party to whom the offender intends to cause wrongful loss or annoyance should be the party against whom the suit is instituted (explanation to clause 196 in the Draft Code).⁷ The object of the suit may be to defraud a third party.

5. 'Court of Justice.'—See s. 20, supra. "Many bodies are not Courts although they have to decide questions, and in so doing have to act judicially, in the sense that the proceedings must be conducted with fairness and impartiality."⁸ A manager dealing with a claim under the Chota Nagpur Encumbered Estate Act, 1876, is not a Court.⁹

It is immaterial whether the Court in which the false claim was instituted had jurisdiction to try the suit or not. The words in the section are "a Court of Justice", and not "a Court of Justice having jurisdiction."¹⁰

6. 'Any claim which he knows to be false.'—A person who brings a claim in the civil Court which he knows to be false commits an offence under this section.¹¹ He does not by so doing, if he succeeds, commit the offence of extortion or, if he fails, of attempting to commit extortion.¹² The ordinary remedy for a person who has had a false suit brought against him, is to apply to the Court to prosecute the plaintiff under this section. In such a case there will be the benefit of the Court's opinion whether the plaintiff was acting with any sinister or improper motive.¹³ An attempt to execute a decree which has been satisfied cannot correctly be described as a false claim.¹⁴

The section is not limited to cases where the whole claim made by the defendant is false. The accused brought a suit against a person to recover Rs. 88-11-0 alleging that the whole of the amount was due from the defendant. The defendant produced a receipt purporting to have been made by the plaintiff for a sum of Rs. 71-3-3, and this amount was proved to have been paid to the accused. The accused was thereupon prosecuted and convicted under this section. It was contended on his behalf that because a part of the accused's claim was held to be well-founded and due and owing, he could not be convicted under this section. It was held that the conviction was right. Straight, J., said: "...if that view were adopted, a man having a just claim against another for Rs 5, may make claim for Rs. 1,000, the Rs. 995 being absolutely false, and he may escape punishment under this section."¹⁵

A person cannot be convicted both of fraudulently and dishonestly making a false claim in a Court of Justice and of falsely attesting the plaint in the false case the latter being an essential ingredient of the former offence.¹⁶ Because the verification of the plaint was a part of the proceeding under which the claim was brought, and did not constitute a separate act which could be treated as a separate offence.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the claim in question was made in a Court of Justice.

(2) That the accused made such claim.

(3) That such claim was a false one.

It is not enough to show that the plaintiff in the civil suit failed to discharge the burden of proof or that in the evidence adduced for the plaintiff there were discrepancies or improbabilities which made it impossible for the Court to rely with confidence on their evidence or even which made it improbable that the fact alleged was true. In a prosecution based on the allegation that a false claim was wilfully presented the prosecution will have to prove affirmatively that the case was false.¹⁷

(4) That the accused when making such claim knew it to be false.¹⁸

(5) That he made such claim, intending to defraud, or to cause wrongful gain or loss, or annoy the person in question.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.¹⁹

The complaint must be made by the Court before which the plaint for the false claim is filed and not by the Court to which the case is transferred after setting aside of the ex parte decree.²⁰

Where a plaintiff is called upon to show cause why he should not be prosecuted under this section, he should be afforded every opportunity of adducing evidence in support of his claim and to remove any doubt in the mind of the Court as to the falsity of the case.²¹

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, fraudulently (or dishonestly or with intent to injure or annoy any person) made a claim, to wit—(state the particulars of the claim) in Suit No.—of—in the Court of—and which you knew to be false, and thereby committed an offence under s. 209 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

COMMENT.

This section is a counterpart of s. 208 in respect of fraudulent decrees, just as s. 207 is the counterpart of s. 206 in respect of fraudulent transfers and conveyances; the object of the Code being to penalise both parties alike. This section taken together with s. 208 will enable both plaintiff and defendant in a fraudulent or collusive suit or execution to be dealt with alike: Section 208 punishes the fraudulent defendant, this section, the fraudulent plaintiff.

1. 'Fraudulently obtains a decree or order.'—See s. 25, supra, as to the definition of 'fraudulently.' In this and in the corresponding s. 208 the intention to defraud is essential. The offence is committed when a decree or order (e.g. order for attachment)²² is fraudulently obtained for a sum not due. The fact that the decree has not been set aside, though admissible to prove that there was no fraud, is not a bar to a prosecution under this section.²³ It is immaterial whether the Court had or had not, power to pass the decree.²⁴ If there is a mistake through misunderstanding but not fraud, no offence under this section is committed.²⁵

2. 'Causes a decree or order to be executed.'—The mere presentation of an application for execution of a decree already executed will not be sufficient. The accused must have caused the decree to be executed against the opposite party 'after it has been satisfied.'²¹ When a decree-holder does not want to proceed with the execution and gets his execution application dismissed he cannot be convicted under this section for fraudulently causing it executed after it has been satisfied.² 'The decree or order' must be that of a civil or revenue Court. The orders of a criminal Court are merely declaratory and do not, therefore, come within this section.

3. 'After it has been satisfied.'—Where a person applies for the execution of a decree which has already been executed, he commits an offence under this section.³ The words "after it has been satisfied" indicate only the fact of the satisfaction of the decree. The fact that the satisfaction is of such a nature that the Court executing the decree could not recognize it, not being certified to the Court, does not prevent the decree-holder from being properly convicted of an offence under this section.⁴ The words 'any Court' in s. 258 (O. XXI, r. 2), Civil Procedure Code, have no application to a criminal Court, investigating a charge of fraudulently executing a decree under this section. These words do not bar any criminal remedy which an injured judgment-debtor may have against a fraudulent decree-holder, whether by a prosecution under ss. 193, 210, 406, or any other section of the Code.⁵

The word 'satisfied' in this section is to be understood in its ordinary meaning and not as referring to decrees, the satisfaction of which has been certified to the Court.⁶

M obtained a decree for the sale of half of certain property. He executed the decree thrice. First, he applied for the sale of the half but in his second application, which was infructuous, he applied for the sale of the whole property and actually got the same sold by his third application. On the judgment-debtor's objection, part of the property was exempted and the decree-holder was put on his trial for an offence under s. 193 which in appeal was changed to this section. It was held that the facts proved did not establish a criminal intention.⁷

When offence is complete.—The offence of fraudulently causing a decree, wholly or in part satisfied, to be executed is completed when an application for execu-

In such a case the offence is not complete until either the judgment-debtor has appeared and made no objection, or has made an objection which has been overruled, and the Court has thereupon proceeded to order execution.⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.— Prove (1) that the accused obtained the decree or order or suffered or permitted the same to be done in his name.

(2) That such decree or order was for a sum not due ; or that it was for a sum larger than what was actually due ; or that it was for property, or an interest therein, to which he was not entitled.

(3) That the accused did as above with intent to defraud.⁹

Or prove the following points :—

(1) That the accused obtained the decree or order.

(2) That he obtained satisfaction thereof.

(4) That such execution was so obtained, etc., for that in respect of which it had been so satisfied.

(5) That the accused did as above with intent to defraud.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.¹⁰

Where the facts primarily and essentially disclose an offence under this section, the other offences alleged being merely subsidiary to the main offence, the complainant cannot be permitted to evade the provisions of s. 195, Criminal Procedure Code, by omitting this section from the complaint.¹¹

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, fraudulently obtained a decree (or order) in Suit No.— of—against you for Rs.—which was not due (or was a larger sum than was due) [or for any property or interest in property to which you are not entitled] [*or fraudulently caused a decree (or order) to be executed against—after it had been satisfied (or fraudulently suffered or permitted any such act to be done in your name)*], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 210 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

211. Whoever, with intent to cause injury to any person,¹ institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceeding² against that person, or falsely charges any person with having committed an offence,³ knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge⁴ against that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both ;

and if such criminal proceeding be instituted⁵ on a false charge of an offence punishable with death, transportation for life, or imprisonment for seven years or upwards, shall be punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

The section includes two distinct offences, namely, (1) actually instituting or causing to be instituted false criminal proceedings, and (2) preferring a false charge.¹² The former assumes the latter, but the latter may be committed where no criminal proceedings follow. Difference is made in punishment according as the charge relates to offences punishable with imprisonment which may extend to seven years or more or otherwise. But under the second paragraph there should be an actual institution of a criminal proceeding on a false charge. The mere making of a false charge would be punishable under the first paragraph. Thus two conditions are necessary before the enhanced punishment provided in the second paragraph could be inflicted: (1) proceedings on the false charge should have been actually instituted; and (2) the false charge must be in respect of an offence punishable with death, transportation for life, or imprisonment for seven years or upwards.

Sections 182 and 211.—The Bombay High Court has held that the criminal law makes a clear distinction between a false charge which comes under s. 211 and false information given to the police, in which latter case the offence falls under s. 182. A person prosecuting another under s. 182 need not prove malice and want of reasonable and probable cause, except so far as they are implied in the act of giving information known to be false, with the knowledge or likelihood that such information would lead a public servant to use his power to the injury or annoyance of the complainant. In an inquiry under s. 211, on the other hand, proof of the absence of just and lawful ground for making the charge is an important element.¹³ The action which s. 211 renders penal is action entailing very serious consequences and therefore the more serious consideration is required on the part of the individual who takes it. It is sufficient, therefore, in such cases, for the prosecution to establish that there was no just or lawful ground for the action taken and that the accused knew this. But something more is required under s. 182. The prosecution must prove not merely absence of reasonable or probable cause for giving the information, but a positive knowledge or belief of the falsity of the information given.¹⁴ If the information conveyed to the police amounts to the institution of criminal proceedings against a defined person or amounts to the falsely charging of a defined person with an offence, then the person giving such information is guilty of an offence under s. 211. In such a case s. 211 is, and s. 182 is not, the appropriate section under which to frame a charge. Section 182, when read with s. 211, must be understood as referring to cases where the information given to the public servant falls short of amounting to an institution of criminal proceedings against a defined person and falls short of amounting to the falsely charging of a defined person with an offence as defined in the Penal Code.¹⁵ Where a person specifically complains that another man committed an offence and does so falsely with the object of causing injury to that person, he is guilty of making a false charge of an offence under s. 211 and not under s. 182.¹⁶

A petition made by a person to the police falsely stating that the petitioner suspects another person of having committed an offence and praying for an inquiry, does not amount to an institution of criminal proceedings against that person within the meaning of s. 211. The petitioner should be charged under s. 182 with having given false information with intent to cause a public servant to use his lawful power to the injury of another person.¹⁷

The Bombay High Court has held that a First Class Magistrate cannot give himself jurisdiction to try an offence under s. 211 by treating it as an offence under s. 182.¹⁸ The Calcutta, the Madras and the Allahabad High Courts differ from the view of the Bombay High Court.

The Calcutta High Court has ruled that a prosecution for a false charge may lie under s. 182 or s. 211, but if the false charge is a serious one, the gravest s. 211 should be applied and the trial should be full and fair.¹⁹ An offence under s. 211 includes an offence under s. 182; it is, therefore, open to a Magistrate to proceed under either section, although, in cases of a more serious nature, it may be that the proper course is to proceed under s. 211.²⁰ Where a false charge is made to the police of a cognizable offence, the offence committed by the person making the charge falls within the meaning of s. 211 and not s. 182.²¹

The Madras High Court has taken the same view as the High Court of Calcutta. It has held that there is no error in a conviction under s. 182, when the false charge made before the police is punishable under the final clause of s. 211. The High Court may quash the conviction and sentence for the minor offence and direct a trial before a tribunal having jurisdiction for the graver; but whether it will do so, or not, is a question not of law, but of expediency on the facts of the particular case.²² A person making a false charge of theft to the police is liable to be punished both under ss. 182 and 211, though his primary object in making the charge may have been to protect himself rather than to injure the person falsely charged.²³ In a later case, however, it has held that for an offence under s. 182 it is only necessary that the information given by the accused to a public servant should be false to his knowledge, whereas to constitute an offence under s. 211, it is necessary that the accused should institute or cause to be instituted some criminal proceedings against another person or should falsely charge him with having committed an offence.²⁴ When a complaint sets forth certain facts disclosing a minor offence and also a graver offence the prosecution should ordinarily be for the graver offence and if in entertaining such a complaint there is a legal bar to taking cognizance of the graver offence by reason of the want of a complaint by the Magistrate, the legal consequence should not be allowed to be evaded by confining the case to the minor offence alone and disposing of it accordingly.²⁵ Where, when all the facts of a complaint were considered, it was clear that the only section which was appropriate and which must be applied was this section, and a complaint under that section could, in the circumstances of the case, be made by a private person, it was held that the Court must regard the complaint as being one under this section primarily and that it was not debarred from trying the case under that section simply because the complaint also disclosed a minor offence under s. 182 of the Code for which a written complaint from a public servant was necessary.¹

The Allahabad High Court once held that where a specific false charge was made, the proper section, for proceedings to be adopted under, was s. 211.² But this view is modified in a subsequent case in which Edge, C. J., said: "Although it is difficult to see what case could arise under s. 211 to which s. 182 could not be applied yet s. 182 would apply to a case which might not fall under s. 211. The offence under s. 182 is complete when false information is given to a public servant by a person who believes it to be false, but who intends thereby to cause such public servant to institute criminal proceedings against a third person. The offence is complete although the public servant takes no step towards the institution of such criminal proceedings... it is in such a case not at all necessary that the public servant should take any step whatever on the false information before instituting and prosecuting to a conclusion a charge under s. 182 against the person who had given such false information.... In cases to which s. 211 especially applies, and in which a criminal proceeding has been instituted, a Court should... as a rule proceed to determine such criminal proceeding instituted in it and should give the person instituting such proceeding, a reasonable opportunity of supporting his case before proceeding against him for an offence under s. 211. We are unable to ascertain that there is any restriction imposed by the Indian Penal Code or by the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882 upon the prosecution of an offence either under s. 182 or 211. It appears to us that it has been left to the discretion of the Court to determine when and under what circumstances prosecutions should be proceeded with under ss. 182 and 211.³ In a later case, however, the same High Court observed incidentally that s. 211 was not intended to apply to anything except charges preferred in Court to a Magistrate, and s. 182 was intended to apply where false information was given to the police.⁴ The soundness of this view is doubted in subsequent cases.⁵ Where the complainant confines himself to reporting what he knows of the facts, stating his suspicions, and leaving the matter to be further investigated by the police, or leaving the police to take such course as they think right in the performance of their duty, he may be making a report, but he is not making a charge. But if he takes the further step, without waiting for any official investigation, of definitely alleging his belief in the guilt of a specified person, and his desire that the specified person be proceeded against in Court, that act of his, whether verbal or written, if made to an officer of the law authorized to initiate proceedings based upon the complainant's statement, whether amounting to an expression of the complainant's belief in the guilt of the specified person, or his desire that Court proceedings be taken against him, amounts to making a charge.⁶ Thus, where the accused laid a clear and definite information before the police to the effect that there was a dacoity in his house and that certain particular persons had taken part in it, and it was found that no dacoity had taken place and that, at any rate, the persons mentioned by the accused never took part in the dacoity, it was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under s. 211.⁷ When either of the sections 182 or 211 is applicable at the instance of a Police Superintendent or a Magistrate, the discretion or power of one or the other to proceed is not limited in any way whatever by the discretion vested in the other.⁸

The Patna High Court has adopted the view of the Calcutta High Court. It has held that an offence under s. 211 must always include an offence under s. 182 and the Court is competent to proceed and convict for the minor offence under s. 182 even though the major offence under s. 211 has been committed.⁹ Even if a Magistrate is disentitled by a statutory bar to take cognizance of an offence under s. 182, he can take cognizance of an offence under s. 211. He may take cognizance of an offence under s. 211 on the complaint of the investigating police-officer though he is not also an officer referred to under s. 190 (1) (a), Criminal Procedure Code, but if the charge under s. 211 fails, there cannot by reason of s. 190 (1) (a) be a conviction under s. 181.¹⁰

The former Chief Court of the Punjab had expressed its opinion similar to that of the Bombay High Court in a case where A falsely, and with intent to injure, informed the police that B had stolen property in his house. The police searched B's house, and the information proved to be false. It was held that A had instituted criminal proceedings and he was guilty of an offence under this section and not under s. 182.¹¹ The Lahore High Court has held that an offence under s. 182 is included in the more serious offence falling under s. 211, and a prosecution for a false charge may be either under s. 182 or s. 211 though clearly if s. 211 does apply and the false charge is serious, prosecution should be under the more serious section s. 211. But this does not mean that where an offence under s. 182 is complete and the prosecution is lodged under s. 182, the proceedings under s. 182 must subsequently be quashed merely because the accused, not content with the false report to the police, had subsequently made a false complaint to a Magistrate in addition, and thereby exposed himself to a prosecution under s. 211. A repetition of the same complaint to a different person and under different circumstances, would not render the person, who made the false complaint, free from liability to prosecution for an offence which he had already committed and which was complete in itself.¹²

The former Chief Court of Lower Burma had adopted the view of the Calcutta, the Allahabad and the Madras High Courts.¹³ The Rangoon High Court has held that an offence under s. 211 includes an offence under s. 182, but the converse does not hold good. The accused laid a false charge of robbery and hurt in an information before the police, which was thrown out. Subsequently, he lodged a complaint in Court which was dismissed by the Magistrate. It was held that the accused should be prosecuted under s. 211 on a complaint by the Court.¹⁴ This case has been dissented from in a subsequent case in which the accused laid a false charge of robbery in an information before the police, who after investigation threw out the case. The accused thereafter lodged a complaint in Court for the same offence but the complaint was dismissed. It was held that the accused had committed two distinct offences under s. 182 and this section, and could be prosecuted for either offence, though in the ordinary way if a prosecution takes place it should be for the more serious of the two offences committed.¹⁵ Subsequently it has held that where a person does not confine himself to reporting what he knows of the facts, stating his suspicions and leaving the matter to be further investigated by the police, but definitely alleges his belief in the guilt of certain men and insists on proceedings being taken against them, it amounts to a charge within the meaning of this section. And as soon as the charge is made, the offence under this section is complete and the injured party can file a complaint against the informant under this section irrespective of the fact that the latter files a complaint subsequently.¹⁶

Ingredients.—The necessary ingredients to constitute a false charge under this section are three :—

1. An intention to cause injury to a particular person.
2. Such injury should have been intended—
 - (a) by instituting or causing to be instituted criminal proceedings against that person, or
 - (b) by falsely charging him with having committed an offence.
3. Knowledge that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceedings or charge against that person.

1. 'Whoever with intent to cause injury to any person.'—The word 'whoever' indicates that the section applies to anyone who contravenes its provisions. The section applies not only to a private individual, but also to an officer who brings a false charge of an offence with intent to injure.¹⁷ 'Intent to cause injury' is an essential part of the offence.¹⁸ The phrase is precisely the same as the English legal term 'maliciously.' 'Injury' denotes any harm whatever, illegally caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or property (s. 44).

2. 'Institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceedings.'—The term 'institution' means the institution either by the accused himself, or by the police or others in consequence of the accused's action, in some criminal Court.¹⁹ Institution of a criminal proceeding means laying of an information before a Magistrate.²⁰ The laying of an information which the police-officer has power to investigate and the causing of that officer to investigate the information amounts to institution of criminal proceedings.²¹

Under this section, 'instituting a criminal proceeding' may be treated as an offence in itself apart from 'falsely charging' a person with having committed an offence.²² There are two modes in which a person aggrieved may seek to put the criminal law in motion : (1) by giving information to the police,²³ and (2) by lodging a complaint before a Magistrate.²⁴ A person who sets the criminal law in motion by making to the police a false charge in respect of a cognizable offence institutes criminal proceedings under the first part of this section; and it is not necessary that the complaint should be made to a Magistrate.²⁵ But as the police have no power to take any proceedings in non-cognizance cases without the orders of a Magistrate, a false charge of such offence, made to the police, is not an institution of criminal proceedings but merely a false charge.¹ The distinction between cognizable and non-cognizable offences relates to the powers of the police only, and it will, therefore, seem that the false charge of any offence, whether cognizable or non-cognizable, before a Magistrate, is an institution of criminal proceedings.

When once information is given to police about a cognizable offence, any statement subsequently made by another person to the police is a statement made in police investigation and cannot be made the foundation of a prosecution under this section though it is false.²

If a person files an information before a Magistrate, disclosing circumstances of a civil nature, he cannot be proceeded with under this section if the circumstances alleged by him are found to be false.³ Where a complainant prefers a criminal charge before a Magistrate who neither examines him on oath nor takes down his statement in writing, he cannot be proceeded against under this section even if the charge turns out to be a false one.⁴

A person who answers questions put to him by a police-officer making an investigation under s. 161, Criminal Procedure Code, does not institute or cause to be instituted criminal proceedings within the meaning of this section.⁵

3. 'Falsely charges any person with having committed an offence.'— "The words 'falsely charging'...must be construed along with the words which speak of the 'institution of proceedings.' These latter words are obviously used in a technical and exclusive sense, and by parity of reasoning the same restricted sense must be given to the words which relate to a false charge."⁶ The words 'falsely charges' must be restricted to a charge made to some person in authority, that is to say, to some person who is in a position to get the offender punished. The charge must be embodied either in a complaint to a Magistrate or in a report of a cognizable offence to a police-officer,⁷ or to an officer who has statutory authority over his subordinate against whom the allegations are made.⁸ The word 'charges' means something different from 'gives information.' The true test seems to be, does the person, who makes the statement which is alleged to constitute the 'charge' do so with the intention and object of setting the criminal law in motion against the person against whom the statement is directed? Such object and intention may be inferred from the language of the statement and the circumstances in which it is made.⁹ A petition was presented with the object of bringing to the knowledge of the authorities certain matters regarding which the petitioner had received information, in order that there might not be a repetition of an alleged tutoring of witnesses, and not with the object that the authorities should institute criminal proceedings. It was held that the petition did not amount to a 'charge' within the meaning of this section.¹⁰ A false petition to the Superintendent of Police, praying for the protection of the petitioners from the oppression of a Sub-Inspector, which may be effected by a departmental action, does not amount to such a false charge. For an allegation to amount to a false charge, it must be made with the intention and object of setting the criminal law in motion.¹¹

Two out of three Judges comprising a full bench of the Madras High Court have held that the words 'false charge' must not be understood in any technical or restricted sense, but in their ordinary meaning of a false accusation made to any authority bound by law to investigate it or to take any steps in regard to it, such as giving information of it to superior authorities; and the institution of criminal proceedings includes the setting of the criminal law in motion. A complaint to a Village Magistrate, in such a case, amounts to a 'charge' and is also an institution of criminal proceedings. It would be otherwise if the offence complained of is one in regard to which the information need not, under s. 45 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, be passed to the higher authorities.¹² A complaint made to an executive officer as such which contains certain imputations against a person is not making a false charge.¹³

In the first part of this section the expressions "institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceeding" and "falsely charges" are used, and in the second part the expression "if such criminal proceeding be instituted" is only used. From this it was argued in a full bench case of the Calcutta High Court that the Legislature must have meant different things when it spoke of "instituting proceedings" and "making a charge", and that only what fell within the former phrase was within the latter part of the section. Wilson, J., who delivered the judgment of the full bench, said: "I agree in this reasoning in one sense and not in another. I agree that we must take it that the Legislature did not regard the two phrases as co-extensive in meaning, but considered that there were, or might be, cases to which the one would apply and not the other. But I do not think we are to suppose that the Legislature meant the phrases to be mutually exclusive in meaning, so that the instituting of criminal proceedings must be by something which is not a charge, and a charge must be something which is not the institution of criminal proceedings. This cannot, I think, be for two reasons. First, because there is no mode by which a private accuser can institute criminal proceedings except by making a charge; and if he does not do it by the charge, he never does it at all, to whatever length the proceedings may go. And secondly, because the last part of the section speaks of 'proceedings instituted on a false charge'".¹⁴ There is no distinction between the first and second parts of this section between proceedings before the Police and proceedings before the Magistrate. The second part of s. 211 must be read with the first part and the second part refers to "such criminal proceedings." Obviously these criminal proceedings are the criminal proceedings referred to in the first part. The criminal proceedings are just as much instituted within the meaning of the section when first information of a cognizable offence is given to the Police under s. 154, Criminal Procedure Code, as when a complaint is made direct to a Magistrate under s. 200. The words "be instituted" in the second part of this section do not denote the past tense as is sometimes contended. The words denote the passive mood.¹⁵

It is enough if it appear that the charge was deliberately made before an officer of police with a view to its being brought before a Magistrate. It is not necessary that the charge must have been fully heard and dismissed.¹⁶ It is enough that a false charge is made though no prosecution is instituted thereon;¹⁷ but the charge should not be pending at the time of the offender's trial.¹⁸ It is not necessary that summons should be issued upon such complaint;¹⁹ or that the statement made by the accused to the police-officer should be reduced to writing in accordance with s. 154 of the Criminal Procedure Code.²⁰

Bare statement is not false charge.—A statement to the police of a suspicion that a particular person has committed an offence is not a charge within the meaning of this section, nor does it amount to an institution of a criminal proceeding, and a conviction cannot be had on proof that the suspicion was unfounded.²¹ The mere despatch of a telegram falsely stating that a dacoity had been committed without mentioning the names of any persons alleged to have been concerned or suspected of complicity in the offence, does not amount to the institution of a false charge.²² A made a report to the police that his buffalo had been poisoned and that he suspected G of having administered the poison. The police made an inquiry and reported that there was no case of poisoning and the charge was struck out. G then brought a complaint under this section against A. It was held that the report to the police did not amount to a charge of a criminal offence.²³ Something more is requisite than merely to falsely impute against a person that he has committed an offence. The 'charge' contemplated in this section appears both from the context and from the position of the section to be a charge made in order to the institution of criminal proceedings.²⁴ If the statement is followed up by active steps against the person said to be suspected that is a charge.²⁵

False charge should be made to Court or officer having jurisdiction to investigate.—The false charge must be made to a Court or to an officer who has power to investigate and send it up for trial.¹ It must be an accusation made with the intention to set the law in motion.² Where the tribunal before whom the complaint was made was not competent to take any action direct or indirect to punish the persons complained against, it is not possible to hold that the accused "charged" such persons with any offence or that his intention necessarily was that action should be taken against them, as he might well have intended to secure some advantage to himself.³ One G sent a registered letter to the Superintendent of Police complaining that the Sub-Inspector had exacted a bribe. An inquiry was made by the Prosecuting Inspector, after which he moved the Court by means of a letter to prosecute G under this section. It was held that no offence under this section was committed as the section contemplated that the charge should be made to some person in authority who was in a position to get the offender punished.⁴

A woman appeared before the Station Staff Officer and accused a non-commissioned officer of rape; and, after a military inquiry, the military authority held that the charge was false and directed the complainant to be prosecuted under this section. The conviction was set aside.⁵ Where the petitioner laid a charge of mischief by fire at a thana, which was reported to be false, and the District Magistrate, upon the receipt of a report to the same effect from a Deputy Magistrate, to whom he had sent the case for a judicial inquiry, passed the final order in the police report in these terms :—"Enter false, s. 436; Indian Penal Code. Prosecution under s. 211, Indian Penal Code, sanctioned. To Babu M. N. Mukerjee for trial." It was held that the order of the District Magistrate was bad as the matter of the false charge had not come before him in the course of a judicial proceeding.⁶

A person made a complaint to a District Registrar against the conduct of a subordinate officer, a Sub-Registrar, alleging that the latter had misappropriated a sum of money paid to him on account of fees for a commission, and the District Registrar after holding a departmental inquiry was satisfied as to the falsity of the complaint and made a report to himself as District Magistrate, and in this latter capacity passed the following order : "Read report of District Registrar. Prosecution of EB under ss. 211 and 182 of the Indian Penal Code sanctioned. Summon EB : ss. 182 and 211, Indian Penal Code." It was held that it was not clear from the record whether the District Magistrate purported to act under s. 195 or s. 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code. If he purported to act under s. 195, then the sanction would be without jurisdiction as to s. 182, Indian Penal Code, inasmuch as he was not the public officer concerned or the public officer to whom he was subordinate; and so far as the sanction related to this section it was equally without jurisdiction as there was no offence committed in or in relation to any proceedings in Court.⁷

A peon sent a telegram to the Collector saying that the Tahsildar and certain others in his absence entered his house and forcibly inoculated his wife and children. The Collector sent the telegram to a Magistrate who examined the peon and certain witnesses who stated that they had heard that the complainant's house was forcibly entered into. Finding the statement false he directed the prosecution of the complainant and his witnesses. It was held that the complaint was no complaint in law and a prosecution could not be maintained against the peon under this section.⁸

Statement under s. 162, Criminal Procedure Code.—A statement under s. 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code in answer to questions put by a police-officer making an investigation under s. 161 of that Code cannot be made the basis of a prosecution under this section.⁹ Such a statement is not a complaint or charge and cannot be made the basis of a prosecution for an offence under this section.¹⁰

'Offence' means a thing punishable under the Code or under any special or local law (s. 40). The criminal proceedings and false charges contemplated by this section mean proceedings instituted and charges made according to the provisions of criminal law in force in British India.¹¹

4. 'Knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge.'—This expression is the equivalent of the English technical phrase "without reasonable or probable cause", which means "an honest belief in the guilt of the accused based upon a full conviction, founded upon reasonable grounds, of the existence of a state of circumstances, which, assuming them to be true, would reasonably lead any ordinary prudent and cautious man, placed in the position of the accuser, to the conclusion that the person charged was probably guilty of the crime imputed. There must be : first, an honest belief of the accuser in the guilt of the accused; secondly, such belief must be based on an honest conviction of the existence of the circumstances which led the accuser to that conclusion; thirdly, such secondly-mentioned belief must be based upon reasonable grounds; by this I mean such grounds as would lead any fairly cautious man in the defendant's situation so to believe; fourthly, the circumstances so believed and relied on by the accuser must be such as amount to reasonable ground for belief in the guilt of the accused."¹² "Unless the person making a charge actually knows that there is no just or lawful ground for it, he is not guilty of the offence, and cannot properly be convicted of it. It is not enough to find that he has acted in bad faith, that is, without due care or inquiry, or that he has acted maliciously, or that he had no sufficient reason to believe or did not believe the charge to be true. The actual falsity of the charge, recklessness in acting upon information without testing it, or scrutinising its sources, actual malice towards the persons charged, these are all relevant evidence, more or less cogent, but the ultimate conclusion must be, in order to satisfy the definition of the offence, that the accused knew that there was no just or lawful ground for proceeding. It may be difficult to prove this knowledge, but however difficult it may be, it must be proved, and unless it is proved the informer must be acquitted."¹³

has he committed an offence under this section. To constitute this offence it must be shown that the person instituting criminal proceedings knew there was no just or lawful ground for such proceedings.¹⁴ It is not a sufficient ground that a person to whom a wrong has been done, or who conceives that a wrong has been done to him, makes a charge or complaint upon evidence or a statement which is not or ought not to be sufficient to satisfy a reasonable mind, if in truth he did not know, at the time he made the complaint, that there was no just and lawful ground for making it.¹⁵

The failure to prove a case by the complainant is not the same thing as the institution of a maliciously false case, so as to make him liable for an offence under this section.¹⁶

In the absence of any special circumstances to rebut it, the judgment of one competent tribunal against the complainants affords a very strong evidence of reasonable and probable cause.¹⁷

5. 'If such criminal proceedings be instituted.'—There is a divergence of view between the Calcutta, the Madras and the Patna High Courts on the one hand, and the Allahabad and the Bombay High Courts on the other, as to the question whether the latter part of this section applies to such cases of complaints to the police which are disposed of without a formal magisterial inquiry. This divergence of view is due to the fact that a Magistrate has no jurisdiction to try certain offences under the second portion of the section, but only the Court of Session. A full bench of the Calcutta High Court¹⁸ has held that the latter part of this section would apply to such cases when the charge related to the more serious offence. This full bench case is followed by the Madras High Court in *Queen-Empress v. Nanjunda. Rao*¹⁹ in which the Court said: "We are unable to find any warrant for holding that the words 'the institution of criminal proceedings' should be limited to the bringing of a charge before the magistrate, or to action by the magistrate or police against the person charged. It seems to us that when, as in this case, a charge of a cognizable offence is made to the police against a specified person, criminal proceedings within the meaning of the section have been instituted just as much as if the charge had been made before the magistrate." "The test to apply is,—did the person who makes the charge intend to set the criminal law in motion against the person against whom the charge is made."²⁰

The Patna High Court has followed the Calcutta ruling.²¹ Where a person who gives false information as to the commission of an offence merely states that he suspects a certain other person to be the offender, it may be that he would not be liable under this section, but where it is clear that the informant's intention was not merely that the police should follow up a clue but that they should put the alleged offender on trial, the informant is guilty of an offence under this section.²²

The Oudh Chief Court has also adopted the view of the Calcutta High Court.²³

The Allahabad High Court has, on the other hand, held that to constitute the offence defined in the second paragraph of this section, it is necessary that criminal proceedings should be instituted. Where the offence committed does not go further than the making of a false charge to the police, the making of such a charge does not amount to an institution of criminal proceedings, and the offence committed will fall within the first paragraph, notwithstanding that the offence so falsely charged may be one of those referred to in the second paragraph.²⁴ The words "if such criminal proceedings be instituted on a false charge of an offence punishable with death, etc.", compared with the phraseology of the first part of the section, leave no doubt that the actual institution of criminal proceedings on a false charge is essential to the application of the latter part of this section and that if the offence of the accused stops at making a false charge, his case falls under the first part of the section irrespective of the fact that the false charge relates to 'an offence punishable with death, transportation for life, or imprisonment for seven years or upwards'.²⁵ Both these cases have been dissented from by a Division Bench of the same High Court, which has adopted the view of the Calcutta, the Madras and the Patna High Courts. In this case it was held that a man who sets the criminal law in motion by making a false charge to the police of a cognizable offence institutes criminal proceedings within the meaning of this section, and if the offence falls within the description in the latter part of the section, he is liable to the punishment there provided. Making of a false charge to the police of a cognizable offence is the institution of criminal proceedings within the meaning of this section.¹

J. R. 989, 11 Cr. L. J. 54, in which it is held, following the first two authorities, that if the Magistrate commits the accused for trial to the Court of Session only on the ground that the offence charged falls within the second paragraph of that section, and does not say that the fine or sentence which he can impose will not be adequate to meet the ends of justice, the commitment is bad in law.

The Bombay High Court has agreed with the view of the Allahabad High Court in Bisheshar's case and held that in order to bring a case within the second part of this section criminal proceedings must be instituted in a Court on a false charge. The giving of information to the police of a cognizable offence does not amount to institution of criminal proceedings within the meaning of the second part of the section; and if the case gets no further than a police inquiry, it falls within the first part of the section. In this case the accused complained to the police stating that certain persons had been guilty of dacoity, an offence punishable under s. 395. The police inquired into the matter and came to the conclusion that the charge was false. The accused having been charged with having committed an offence under this section, the Magistrate convicted him of the offence. The District Magistrate took the view that the offence fell under the second part of this section, and being triable by the Court of Session, the First Class Magistrate had no jurisdiction to try it. It was held that the case fell within the first part of this section and, therefore, the First Class Magistrate had jurisdiction to try the case.²

The former Chief Court of the Punjab held similar to the earlier view of the Allahabad High Court: "The first part of Section 211 deals with two kinds of acts by an accused, (a) the institution, or causing the institution, (not an attempt to cause the institution) of any criminal proceeding; (b) the making of a false charge: and however grave may be this charge, it is only when criminal proceedings are actually instituted that a special punishment is provided by the latter part of the section. Any charge of a cognizable offence must be followed by some enquiry by the Police, and if such enquiry alone were to be considered a criminal proceeding within the first part of the section, there would seem to be no reason for the distinction between the institution of proceedings and the making of a false charge. It seems to us clear that the 'institution' referred to in this section is the institution, either by the accused himself, by the Police or others, in consequence of accused's action, in some Criminal Court. It also appears to us that although the moral guilt of the accused may be the same in each case, yet as regards the effect of his act, it makes the very greatest difference whether the persons whom he charges are disgraced by being dragged—probably in custody—before a Criminal Court, or whether they are merely put to the inconvenience of answering a few questions by the Police and supporting their answer by evidence ready to their hand".³ Following this case the same Court held that the submission of a petition containing a false charge of bribery to the Inspector-General of Police against a Sub-Inspector is punishable under this section.⁴

The Former Judicial Commissioner's Court at Nagpur⁵ had adopted the view of the Allahabad High Court in Bisheshar's case.⁶

The Rangoon High Court has adopted the earlier view of the Allahabad High Court as laid down in the cases of Pitam Rai, Parahu, and Bisheshar, and has differed from the views of the Calcutta, the Madras, and the Patna High Courts. It holds that this section refers to three matters; (1) falsely charging a person, (2) instituting criminal proceedings against that person, and (3) causing to be instituted criminal proceedings against that person. If an offender has merely falsely charged a person with any offence whatsoever by making a report to the police, and the police refuse to initiate proceedings, then what has been done is merely that a false charge has been made. The offence comes within the first part of the section punishable with two years' imprisonment or fine or both, and the case is triable by a first class magistrate. If the offender files a complaint before a magistrate under s. 190 of the Criminal Procedure Code, he has instituted criminal proceedings; if on the offender's report the police send up a case for trial he has caused criminal proceedings to be instituted within the meaning of this section.

If criminal proceedings have been instituted or caused to be instituted by the offender before a Court and his offence comes under the second part of this section, he is liable to a heavier punishment and the case can only be tried by a Court of Session if he has falsely accused his opponent of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life.⁷

False charge of arson.—Where a man burnt his own house and charged another with the act, it was held that he had committed an offence under this section and not under s. 195.⁸

False charge of dacoity.—Where a false charge of dacoity was made to a police-officer, who referred it to a Magistrate as false, and the Magistrate ordered the charge to be dismissed without taking any action against the parties implicated, and the person who preferred the charge was tried under this section, it was held that he had instituted criminal proceedings within the meaning of this section.⁹

False charge of theft.—Where A falsely and with intent to injure B informed the police that B had stolen property in his house, and the police searched B's house, and the information proved to be false, it was held that A had instituted criminal proceedings, and that he was therefore guilty of an offence under this section and not under s. 182.¹⁰

False charge of hurt.—Where a charge of voluntarily causing hurt contained in a petition of complaint was wilfully false, and made with intent to injure another, the complainant was held guilty of this offence.¹¹

False charge in petition which is not complaint.—Where the accused submitted a petition to the Deputy Commissioner while he was on tour, making certain complaints against a manager of the Court of Wards, and the accused was convicted of an offence under this section for making a false charge against the manager of the Court of Wards, it was held that the petition submitted by the accused not being a complaint within the meaning of s. 4 (h) of the Criminal Procedure Code and there being no institution of criminal proceedings, the conviction was illegal.¹²

False report by police-officer.—Where a head constable falsely reported to his superior that certain persons were in the habit of dealing in stolen goods and they were prosecuted but acquitted, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.¹³ But where a police-officer made a false report regarding a certain offence, which the Magistrate found, after hearing the evidence, to be false, it was held that he could not be prosecuted under this section as he had not instituted criminal proceedings against any person.¹⁴

Partly false and partly true complaint.—The section contemplates a charge which is indivisible in its nature; to judge whether a complaint, part of which is true and part of which is false, falls under the section, the nature of the complaint or charge made by the accused has to be considered: in other words, whether the complaint is substantially true or whether it is substantially false, no precise rule or principle can be laid down in respect of the question, and each case must depend upon its own circumstances.¹⁵

Vexatious charge.—To bring a vexatious charge is not an offence under this section.¹⁶

Compounding.—The fact that an offence alleged to have been committed had been compounded is no conclusive answer to a charge made against the prosecutor under this section.¹⁷

Abetment.—A person cannot be convicted of abetment of a false charge solely on the ground of his having given evidence in support of such charge.¹⁸

Civil remedy.—A person aggrieved by a false charge may, if he choose, sue in a civil Court for damages for malicious prosecution, instead of taking criminal proceedings under this section. (For civil remedy, see the authors' "Law of Torts", Ch. XV). A criminal prosecution for an offence under this section is not a condition precedent to the right to sue for damages.¹⁹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused instituted or caused to be instituted criminal proceedings; or

That he made a charge of an offence.

(2) That there were no just or lawful grounds for such proceedings; or that such charge was false.

It is the duty of the prosecution to prove by satisfactory evidence that the charge was wilfully false to the knowledge of the maker of the charge.²⁰

(3) That the accused then knew such criminal proceedings, or charge to be without just or lawful grounds.²¹

(4) That he did as above with intent to cause injury to the person in question.²²

It is for the prosecution to make out a distinct case against the accused; not for the accused in the first instance to show that he had just or lawful grounds.²³ If the prosecution fail to supply that proof which is required to secure the conviction of the accused, the failure on the part of the latter to examine any particular witness will not imply the guilt of the accused.²⁴ The party accused should be allowed to show the information on which he acted and the Judge ought not only to be satisfied that the facts alleged as the grounds for making the charge are in themselves untrue and insufficient, but also that they were known to be such to the accused when the charge was made by him.²⁵

Failure on the part of the complainant to establish the truth of his allegation does not by any means justify the inference that the complaint was false; and to secure a conviction in this class of cases it must further be established beyond reasonable doubt that the circumstances are not merely consistent with the guilt of the accused but entirely inconsistent with his innocence.¹

In a case under this section the complainant cannot be confronted with the statements made by him as accused during the previous police investigation into the offence alleged to be committed by him.²

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first class: by Court of Session, Magistrate, Presidency

or first class, if the offence charged be punishable with imprisonment for seven years or upwards; by Court of Session alone if the offence charged be capital or punishable with transportation for life.

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which such Court is subordinate, is required for a prosecution under this section.³ The Court must make a complaint and cannot directly order prosecution. The complaint must set forth the offence, the precise facts on which it is based, and the evidence available for proving it.⁴ A Court should not make a complaint where there are not sufficient materials before it to show that there is a prima facie case against the accused. The mere fact that a complaint was dismissed by a Magistrate summarily under s. 203, Criminal Procedure Code, will not throw the burden on the complainant to prove that the complaint was a reasonable and honest one, and justify a complaint by the Court.⁵

A prosecution of a charge under this section should not be launched as a matter of course, but only when the complainant can satisfy the Court, that the interests of justice require a prosecution, and there is a strong prima facie case against the accused.⁶ The fact that the complainant fails to prove his case is by itself not sufficient.⁷ Where a case was taken on file after investigation by the police, the subsequent discharge of the accused would not justify the making of a complaint under this section.⁸ Great delay in proceedings under this section will not be tolerated.⁹

Where a complaint made by a person is referred to by the police and the complainant does not appear before the Magistrate there is no proceeding in any Court and a complaint by the Magistrate is not necessary for the prosecution of the complainant in respect of a cognizable offence.¹⁰

When a false complaint is made to a Magistrate and the complainant is proceeded against under this section with respect to the complaint, the Magistrate to whom the complaint was made is not himself competent to inquire into the offence.¹¹

False charge made to police and not to Magistrate.—Where a false charge has been made only to the police, or when the person making the false charge has not applied to the Magistrate and where no Court proceedings whatever have been caused, then no complaint is necessary.¹² Where the offence consists in giving false information to the police and the case does not go further than a police inquiry the offence falls within para. 1 of the section and not within para. 2. In such a case it is competent to the Magistrate to proceed on the report of the police without any formal complaint under s. 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code.¹³ But if a complaint is made to a Court and then a statement is made to a police-officer, the police cannot proceed against the complainant without a complaint by the Court.¹⁴

The Calcutta High Court has held that where an information to the police is followed by a complaint to the Court, based on the same allegations and the same charge, and such complaint has been investigated by the Court, the complaint of the Court itself is necessary even for a prosecution of the informant under this section in respect of the false charge made to the police.¹⁵ The Madras High Court¹⁶ has held likewise. The Patna High Court has even further held that in respect of a false charge made to the police, which alone is the subject-matter of the complaint under s. 211, the complaint of the Court itself would be necessary for taking cognizance of it if a complaint was preferred to a Magistrate for a judicial investigation even though that Magistrate did not in fact investigate the complaint.¹⁷ The Bombay High Court has adopted the view of the Calcutta, the Madras, and the Patna High Courts and has held that where an information of an offence given to the police is followed by a complaint to a Magistrate's Court based on the same allegations, in respect of a false charge made to the police, the complaint of the Court is necessary.¹⁸

The Allahabad High Court has taken a contrary view. It has held that when a false charge is made to the police an offence under this section is complete; and it cannot be said, merely because a similar complaint was subsequently made in a Court, that the offence was committed in, or in relation to, any proceedings in any Court, within the meaning of s. 195, Criminal Procedure Code. A complaint in writing of such Court is, therefore, not necessary for a prosecution for such offence.¹⁹ The Rangoon High Court has taken the same view.²⁰

The Bombay High Court has also distinguished the Calcutta decisions in a case in which a complaint was made to the police, and after prosecution under this section by the police and committal to the Court of Session, a fresh complaint was made to a Magistrate. It held that no complaint by the Court was necessary because when the committal order was made there had been no complaint made to a Magistrate.²¹

Before making complaint whether accused should be allowed to prove truth of his complaint.—The Calcutta High Court has held that a trial on a charge under this section for having lodged a false information with the police, without giving the informant an opportunity of proving the truth of the information before a Magistrate, is bad.²² Ordinarily a person should be given an opportunity to show cause before he is ordered to be prosecuted under this section.²³ A commitment for trial under the provisions of this section for knowingly instituting a false charge with intent to injure the persons accused, is not illegal, merely because the complaint which the accused made has not been judicially enquired into, but is based on the report of the police that the case was a false one.²⁴ But where the complaint has been dismissed by the Magistrate as groundless under s. 253 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and the Magistrate has before him the report of the police in support of his view it is not necessary that he should again ask the complainant to prove his case which the Magistrate has disbelieved even before he examined the complainant and his witnesses.²⁵ The Madras High Court has taken the same view. R made a complaint of theft against S to the police. The police referred the case as false to the Magistrate. The Magistrate summoned R and examined him but gave him no opportunity to prove the charge by calling the witnesses named by him. The Magistrate then ordered the case to be struck off the file and gave sanction to prosecute R. R was subsequently brought before the same Magistrate and committed to the Sessions, and convicted by the Sessions Court under this section. It was held that although R had no opportunity of proving his case before he was himself tried the conviction was not illegal.¹

The Patna High Court has held that a Magistrate does not exercise a proper discretion in ordering a complainant to be prosecuted under this section merely on the receipt of a police report that the complaint is false. The complainant should be given a reasonable time and full opportunity to prove his case before sanction is given for his prosecution.² But where, in a cognizable case, the police reported that the information given by an informant was false and made a complaint against that informant under this section, it was held that the Court was not bound, before issuing summons, to call upon the informant to show cause why he should not be prosecuted.³ Where the police report that information given to them was maliciously false, and the informant takes no steps to challenge the police report by means of a petition to a Magistrate, his conviction under this section in respect of the false information cannot be contested on the sole ground that he was not afforded an opportunity of proving his case.⁴ The Magistrate filing a complaint is no worse off than a private prosecutor, and there is no necessity that there should be any preliminary inquiry before process issues. The practice of automatically issuing notice on the accused, on the filing of a complaint to show cause why he should not be prosecuted, is to be condemned as there is in effect a complete rehearsal of the real trial, yet there may be cases where it is desirable to allow the accused to appear and hear him.⁵ A person against whom a complaint of an offence mentioned in s. 195 (1), Criminal Procedure Code, is made, is no more entitled to an opportunity to show cause why the complaint should not be made than a person against whom a complaint of any other offence is made.⁶

The Lahore High Court has held that no person should be proceeded against for making a false charge against another unless he has been given an opportunity of substantiating his allegations by the tribunal before which the charge is made and which proposes to take action against him. It is the duty of the tribunal making a complaint under s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, to come to a judicial finding that the allegations made before it are prima facie false.⁷

The Oudh Chief Court has held that the law does not require that an opportunity should be given to a person accused under this section on the basis of a false report to the police to substantiate the charge contained in the report before starting prosecution, nor is there any general principle of natural justice which requires the issue of a notice to the accused in such a case.⁸

Section 250 of the Criminal Procedure Code.—Where criminal proceedings have been instituted against a person with intent to cause injury to him, without lawful ground, the Magistrate should not dismiss the complaint as false and vexatious and direct the complainant to pay compensation to the person against whom the proceedings are instituted, but should take proceedings under this section.⁹

No pending proceedings.—It must be proved that the original proceedings are not pending at the time of the offender's trial.¹⁰ The original charge need not have been fully heard and dismissed, it is sufficient if it is not pending.¹¹

Finding should state nature of charge.—Where the accused is convicted of having made a false charge of an offence, the nature of the false charge should be stated in the finding and entered in the calendar.¹²

Punishment under second clause.—Where the accused is convicted under the second clause he should be sentenced to imprisonment, with or without fine, and not to fine alone.¹³

Summary proceeding.—The conviction by a Magistrate of a person for an offence under this section in a summary proceeding is improper.¹⁴

Charge-sheet by police.—In a non-cognizable case filing of a charge-sheet by a Sub-Inspector with regard to an offence punishable under this section, alleging that a false complaint had been sent to him through the village Magistrate of an offence under the Arms Act, was held to be a proper method of bringing the case before the Court.¹⁵

Misdirection to jury.—In a case of bringing a false charge of dacoity under this section, the Sessions Judge concluded his charge to the jury in these words : "If you believe the charge of dacoity to be false, then you should find the prisoner guilty under s. 211; otherwise you should acquit him." It was held that the charge was erroneous and defective. The Judge should, in the operative part of the charge, instead of directing as he did, have prominently placed before the jury, one of the most essential elements of the charge under this section, namely, that in instituting the false charge of dacoity there was no just or lawful ground for the charge, and the jury should have been asked to say whether the charge was false and whether in instituting that charge there was no just or lawful ground.^{1a}

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, with intent to cause injury to one——[instituted criminal proceedings before——charging the said——with having committed an offence, to wit——], (or) [falsely charged the said——before——with having committed an offence, to wit——], knowing at the time that there was no just or lawful ground for such proceedings (or charge) against the said——; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by the Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

Punishment.—As to the Frontier District, see the Frontier Crimes Regulation (III of 1901), ss. 6, 11 and 12.

212. Whenever an offence has been committed,¹ whoever harbours or conceals a person whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the offender,² with the intention of screening him from legal punishment,³ shall, if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with transportation for life, or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

if punishment

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year, and not to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

"Offence" in this section includes any act committed at any place out of British India, which, if committed in British India, would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460; and every such act shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be punishable as if the accused person had been guilty of it in British India.

Exception.—This provision shall not extend to any case in which the harbour or concealment is by the husband or wife of the offender.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, knowing that B has committed dacoity, knowingly conceals B in order to screen him from legal punishment. Here, as B is liable to transportation for life, A is liable to imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding three years, and is also liable to fine.

COMMENT.

This section applies to the harbouring of persons who have actually committed certain offences under the Penal Code or an offence under some special or local law, when the thing punishable under such special or local law is punishable with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards. It supposes that some offence has actually been committed, and that the harbourer gives refuge to one whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the offender with the intention of screening him from legal punishment. It does not apply to the harbouring of persons, not being criminals, who merely abscond to avoid or delay a judicial investigation.¹⁷

There is a difference in the wording of the fourth clause of this section and the fourth clause of s. 213. According to this clause no punishment is prescribed if the offence committed by the harboured person is not punishable with imprisonment "which may extend to one year." Under clause 4 of s. 213 such an offence is made punishable.

Harbouring escaped prisoners of war is punishable under s. 130 and harbouring a deserter from the Army, Navy, or Air Force is punishable under s. 136.

This section deals with that class of offenders who are known as 'accessories after the fact' under the English law. An 'accessory after the fact' is one who, knowing a felony to have been committed by another, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the felon.¹⁸

Ingredients.—The section has three essentials :—

1. Commission of an offence.
2. Harbouring or concealing the person known or believed to be the offender.
3. Such concealment must be with the intention of screening him from legal punishment.

1. 'Offence has been committed.'—It must be shown that the offence has been completed before the offender was harboured or concealed. Hawkins¹⁹ says :— "....a man shall never be construed an accessory to a felony, in respect of the receipt of an offender, who at the time of the receipt was not a felon, but afterwards becomes such by matter subsequent; as where one receives another who has wounded a person dangerously, that happens to die after such receipt. For though the offender be for special reasons adjudged to some purposes guilty of homicide ab initio, yet he shall not be so esteemed in respect of any others but himself; for fictions of law shall never be carried further than the reasons which introduce them necessarily require." Under the Penal Code such a person is liable to be convicted of harbouring one who had committed grievous hurt.

2. 'Harbours or conceals a person whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the offender.'—See s. 52A, supra, as to the meaning of 'harbour'. A person who employs another to harbour the offender may be convicted as 'accessory after the fact' though he himself did no act of relieving, etc.²⁰ A person can be supposed to 'know' where there is a direct appeal to his senses. The word 'offender' means a person who has contravened the provision of any criminal law, which is punishable either with death, transportation, imprisonment or fine.²¹

Where a person, being charged with an offence, absconded, and his father, being appointed a special police-officer and directed to produce his son, failed to do so, and long afterwards a police-officer having called at the house and demanded the production of the son, the father handed him over as soon as he returned from a walk, and the father was convicted of harbouring on the finding that he knew of the whereabouts of the son and had neither produced him nor given information to the police. It was held that the father was not guilty of "harbouring" within the meaning of this section.²² This decision is of doubtful authority as it refers to the case of *Emperor v. Husain Bakshi*²³ which has been expressly overruled by the Legislature. See s. 52A, supra.

'Knows.'—It is necessary that the harbourer at the time when he assists, or comforts the offender, should have notice, express or implied, that he had committed a crime.²⁴

'Reason to believe.'—See s. 26, supra.

3. 'Intention of screening him from legal punishment.'—The harbouring or concealing must be with intent to save the offender from punishment.

Exception.—The Exception only extends to the cases where harbour is afforded by a wife or husband. No other relationship can excuse the wilful receipt or assistance of felons; a father cannot assist his child, a child his parent, a brother his brother, a master his servant, or a servant his master. The law in England is to the same effect.

In a case in England a woman was charged with comforting, harbouring, and assisting a man who had committed a murder, and it appeared that she considered herself as his wife, and lived with him as such for years, it was held that she was entitled to be acquitted even though the marriage was in some respects irregular and probably invalid.²⁵

Amendment.—The clause defining 'offence' under this section was introduced by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (III of 1894), s. 7.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that an offence has been committed by the person harboured.

(2) That such offence is punishable with (a) death, or (b) transportation for life or imprisonment not exceeding ten years, or (c) imprisonment from one to ten years.

(3) That the accused has harboured or concealed the offender.

(4) That the accused then knew him to be an offender, or had reason to believe him to be so.

(5) That the accused thereby intended to screen such offender from legal punishment.¹

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or by Magistrate, Presidency or first class, if the case falls under the first or second clause; by Magistrate, Presidency or first class, or by Court by which the offence is triable, if the case falls under the third clause.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That on or about the—day of—the offence of (specify it) was committed at (specify the place) by AB, and that you on or about the—day of—at—harboured (or concealed) the said AB, knowing (or having reason to believe) at the time of the said harbouring (or concealing) that the said AB had committed the said offence—; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 212 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

Punishment.—As to the Frontier District, see the Frontier Crimes Regulation (III of 1901).

Whoever accepts or attempts to obtain, or agrees to accept, any gratification for himself or any other person, or any restitution of property to himself or any other person,¹ in consideration of his concealing an offence or of his screening any person from legal punishment² for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment, shall, if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which, if a capital offence ; may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with transportation for life, or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment not extending to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section is applicable when the person accepting the gratification is not a public servant. If he is a public servant, there would appear to be no advantage in referring to this section and the offence might more properly be dealt with as one under s. 161 or 162.²

The compounding of a crime by some agreement not to bring the criminal to justice, if the property is restored or a pecuniary or other gratification is given is the offence punished by this and the following sections. This section does not apply where the compounding of an offence is legal. It is the duty of every State to punish criminals. No individual has, therefore, a right to compound any crime because he himself is injured and no one else.

Object.—This section and s. 214 are intended to prevent the suppression of prosecutions in cases in which the public is thought to be deeply interested in the punishment of the offender. They impose penalties on transactions entered into with this view.

Ingredients.—The section has two essentials :—

1. A person accepting or attempting to obtain any gratification or restitution of property for himself or any other person.

2. Such gratification must have been obtained in consideration of (a) concealing an offence, or (b) screening any person from legal punishment for an offence, or (c) not proceeding against a person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment.

1. 'Whoever accepts...gratification for himself or any other person, or any restitution of property, etc.'—The offence of compounding a larceny may be committed by a person other than the owner of the goods stolen or a material witness for the prosecution.³

'Gratification'.—See s. 161, supra.

2. 'In consideration of his concealing an offence or of his screening any person from legal punishment.'—See s. 214, infra. This section applies only where there has been an actual concealment of an offence, or screening of a person from legal punishment, or abstention from proceeding criminally against a person, and as consideration for the same; there has been an acceptance of, or attempt to obtain, or agreement to accept, any gratification or restitution of property. It has no application where only an acceptance of, or attempt to obtain, or agreement to accept, any gratification or restitution on a promise to conceal, screen, or abstain, is proved, and nothing more.⁴

This section is applicable only when it is proved that the person screened or attempted to be screened from legal punishment has been guilty of an offence,⁵ and not when there is merely a suspicion of his having committed some offence.⁶ A person complained to the accused, who were Panchayats, that A had stolen his fishing cage and concealed it in a tank near his house. The accused came to A's house and found the cage in the tank. They then took him into custody and threatened to send him up to the thania. Eventually they took from him Rs. 5 and did not proceed against him. The accused were charged with and found guilty of an offence under this section. It was held that the conviction was wrong as there was merely a suspicion of A having committed theft.⁷ G entrusted certain jewellery to M, who pledged the same with S under circumstances which constituted such pledging the offence of criminal breach of trust. The jewellery was later on returned by S to G on the latter's undertaking not to prosecute M for the offence of criminal breach of trust. M was accused of criminal breach of trust, but was acquitted. S and G were also charged with offences under this and the following sections, in that they took and offered restitution of property in consideration of screening an offence. The trying Magistrate convicted S and G of the offences charged, on the ground that for the purposes of the present case M must be held guilty. On appeal it was held, acquitting the accused, (1) that there could be no screening of an offence, which offence was not proved to have been committed; (2) that the trying Magistrate was bound to proceed on the footing that no criminal breach of trust had been committed, since the prosecution could not make it appear that such an offence had been committed.⁸

The word 'offence' denotes a thing punishable under the Code or any special or local law (s. 40).

Exception.—See Exception to s. 214, infra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the commission of the offence concealed.

(3) That the accused accepted, or attempted to obtain, or agreed to accept the gratification or restitution, as described in the section.

(4) That the accused so accepted, etc., in consideration of such concealment, etc., as in (2).

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, if the case falls under the first clause; by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class, if it falls under the second; by Magistrate, Presidency or first class, or by Court empowered to try the offence screened, if it falls under the third.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That on or about the _____ day of _____, at _____, one AB committed the offence of _____, punishable with _____, and that you on or about the _____ day of _____, at _____, accepted (or attempted to obtain, or agreed to accept) a certain gratification, to wit _____, [or certain property, to wit _____] for yourself (or for _____) in consideration of your concealing the said offence of _____ [or screening the said AB from legal punishment for the said offence, or not proceeding against the said AB for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment]; and that you thereby

214. Whoever gives or causes, or offers or agrees to give or cause, any gratification to any person,¹ or to restore or cause the restoration of any property to any person, in consideration of that person's concealing an offence, or of his screening any person from legal punishment² for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment, shall, if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with transportation for life, or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment not extending to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

Exception.—The provisions of sections 213 and 214 do not extend to any case in which the offence may lawfully be compounded.³

COMMENT.

The last section punished the receiver of a gift in consideration of compromising an offence : this section punishes the offerer of the gift.

Scope.—The offence of giving a gratification to any person in consideration of that person concealing any offence, or of his screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment, may be committed not only in respect of a completed offence, but also in respect of an offence, which it is proposed to commit.⁴

Ingredients.—This section has two essentials :—

1. Offering any gratification or restoration of property to some person.
2. Such offer must have been in consideration of that person's (a) concealing an offence, or (b) of his screening any person from legal punishment for an offence, or (c) of his not proceeding against a person, for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment.

1. 'Whoever gives or causes, or offers or agrees to give or cause, any gratification to any person.'—This section makes it an offence not only to give a gratification, but also to agree to give it in consideration of the donee screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, and the use of the word 'agree' involves the idea of something of the nature of a demand.¹⁰ Such agreement is also void under the Indian Contract Act.

'Gratification to any person'—See s. 161, supra.

2. 'In consideration of that person's concealing an offence, or of his screening any person from legal punishment, etc.'—The terms 'concealing an offence' and 'screening any person from legal punishment for any offence' appear to presuppose the actual commission of an offence, or the guilt of the person screened from punishment. It is not the intention of the Legislature to punish the giving of gratification, under a delusion that an offence had been committed or that a person was guilty of such an offence. The intention was to discourage malpractices, when offences have really been committed, or when persons really guilty are screened, and not to ensure general veracity on the part of the public in regard to imaginary offences or offenders. In this case the accused had agreed to give Rs. 10 to S in consideration of his not giving evidence against K, who was charged with the offences of house-breaking by night and theft in a building. S gave evidence against K who was acquitted. The accused was thereupon charged under this section. It was held that he had committed no offence under it.¹¹ Where two of the accused offered a gratification to a public servant in consideration of his not proceeding against them and the other accused, whose books and papers he had seized, it was held that they were guilty under this section and not under ss. 109 and 161.¹²

This section includes the offer of a bribe by the person who has committed the offence that it is desired to screen.¹³ The Calcutta High Court has dissented from this view.¹⁴

3. 'Compounded.'—"Compounding an offence...supposes an arrangement by which the parties have settled their differences, and in the more usual acceptance of the term implies that the prosecutor has received some consideration or gratification for dropping the prosecution. Although the provisions of the Contract Act may not apply, the proof of the arrangement must be similar to that which the Court requires for the proof of any agreement which is in issue. Unless it appears that the parties were free from influence of every kind and were fully aware of their respective rights, it would be impossible to give effect to a so-called arrangement or composition."¹⁵ If the offence is a compoundable one, then even if the gratification is offered to a person who has no right to compound it is immaterial.¹⁶

Under s. 345 of the Criminal Procedure Code, offences punishable under certain sections of the Penal Code may be compounded by certain persons mentioned therein.

Amendment.—The Exception was substituted by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (VIII of 1882), s. 6; and the Illustrations to the section were repealed by Act X of 1882.¹⁷

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1) and (2) as in s. 213; and further—

(3) That the accused gave or caused or offered to give or cause the gratification, etc., as stated in the section.

(4) That he so gave or caused, etc., in consideration of such concealment, etc.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, if the case falls under the first clause; by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class, if it falls under the second; by Magistrate, Presidency or first class, or by Court empowered to try the offence screened, if it falls under the third.

A Court dealing with a charge under this section is not entitled to question or review the correctness of the decision of another Court acquitting a person charged with having committed the offence which the person before it is charged with having attempted to conceal.¹⁸

That on or about the day of——, at——, you gave (or caused or offered to give) a gratification, to wit——, to AB in consideration of the said AB's concealing the offence of——under s.——of——and which offence is punishable with—— [or of his screening you (or any person, to wit——) from legal punishment for the said offence of——] [or of his not proceeding against you or any person, to wit—— for the purpose of bringing you (or him) to legal punishment], and thereby committed an offence under s. 214 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (omit these words when tried by the Magistrate)] on the said charge.

215. Whoever takes or agrees or consents to take¹ any gratification under pretence or on account of helping any person to recover any moveable property of which he shall have been deprived by any offence punishable under this Code,² shall, unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence,³ be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Taking gift to help to recover stolen property, etc.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section is primarily aimed at professional trackers and other persons who, being usually in league with thieves or well aware of their proceedings, obtain money, etc., for the recovery of stolen property, without making any effort to bring the offenders to justice.¹⁹ The Madras²⁰ and the Lahore²¹ High Courts have held that this section was not intended to apply to the actual thief but to some one who, being in league with the thief, received some gratification on account of helping the owner to recover the stolen property, without at the same time using all the means in his power to cause the thief to be apprehended and convicted of the offence. The Allahabad High Court once was of this view, but in a full bench case it has held that an actual thief or a person suspected to be the thief can be convicted under this section.²² The section would, however, apply to cases of persons taking rewards offered in advertisements for the return of stolen property; and such advertisements might amount to abetments of the offence punishable under this section. The Allahabad High Court has, after considering previous cases, laid down that the clear meaning of the section is that it is an offence to receive money for helping any person to recover property stolen or misappropriated and that there is an exception only in favour of a man who can show that he used all means in his power to cause the apprehension of the offender. There is nothing in the section that requires, as an essential ingredient, knowledge on the part of the accused as to who was the thief or other offender who deprived the owner of the movable property.²³ The Rangoon High Court has also held that the wording of this section makes it apply in the majority of cases to offenders other than the actual thief, but a thief may offer to restore the stolen property for a gratification and thereby render himself liable under this section.²⁴

Ingredients.—This section has three essentials:—

1. Taking or agreeing or consenting to take any gratification under pretence or on account of helping any person to recover any movable property.

2. The owner of such property must have been deprived of it by an offence punishable under the Penal Code.

3. The person taking the gratification must not have used all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence.

1. 'Takes or agrees or consents to take'.—These words "imply that the person taking the gratification and the person giving it have agreed, not only as to the object for which the gratification is to be given, but also as to the shape or form the gratification is to take...if a person has actually taken a gratification from another, it must be assumed that he agreed to take, and the other to give it in that particular form or shape; but where the gratification has not actually passed and there is a disagreement as to the form or shape that the gratification is to take the idea of agreement or consent is negated".²⁵

2. 'Property of which he shall have been deprived by any offence punishable under this Code'.—It must be proved that a person has been deprived of movable property by means of an offence punishable under the Code.¹ A lost a cow from his grazing ground. Some days later he heard that B had it. A went to him. B took Rs. 12 from him and promised to return the cow in ten days' time. He did not, however, keep his promise and subsequently refused to return either the cow or the money. It was held that B was guilty of an offence under this section.² The word "deprive" is not confined in its meaning to "take out of the possession" of the owner, but includes the preventing of the owner from getting possession. Where, therefore, a bullock was tied up during the night in the owner's house and was missing next morning, and three days later the accused, who promised to return the bullock for a sum of money and who were paid that sum, took the owner direct to a spot in the jungle and pointed out the bullock tied up to a tree, it was held that as the tying up of the bullock in the jungle prevented the bullock from going back to the owner's house, which it would normally do if it had only strayed and not been stolen, the accused were guilty of an offence under this section.³

3. 'Unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended, etc.'.—The offence under this section is only committed if the person accepting gratification has failed to use all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended. The Calcutta High Court has held that the words "unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended" is a saving clause and an exception. Once the elements of an offence under this section have been established by evidence, the onus of proving that the accused is entitled to the benefit of the exception is on him. The accused must show that he is not liable to punishment because of having used all means in his power to secure the arrest and conviction of the offender.⁴

Attempt.—An "attempt to take a gratification within the meaning of section 215...necessarily includes the idea of a concurrence of will between the giver and taker; with this much superadded thereto, that some act has been done preliminary to the act of taking. In other words, an attempt is a stage in the commission of the offence which is intermediate between the agreement or consent and the actual taking".⁵ Thus, where two persons offered to secure the return of bullocks stolen from a third person for Rs. 30, and that third person refused but offered Rs. 15, which offer was rejected by the two persons, it was held that they had committed no offence.⁶ This case has been dissented from in a later case where Rafiq, J., observed: "I think that if an attempt to take a gratification within the meaning of s. 215 of the Indian Penal Code necessarily includes the idea of a giver and taker, it is no more an attempt to commit an offence but a substantive offence, on the language of the section. In an offence like the one specified in s. 215 of the Indian Penal Code, an attempt to commit it could only be under circumstances similar to those of the present case". In this case S had some of his buffaloes stolen. H proposed to S that if S gave him Rs. 200 and promised to take no steps to prosecute the thieves he could procure the restoration of the stolen cattle. S, however, would not agree to this proposal and reported the matter to the police. It was held that H was guilty of an attempt to commit the offence under this section.⁷ The former Chief Court of Lower Burma, dissenting from Chittar's case, held that in order to constitute an attempt to commit an offence under this section it is not necessary that the person who is willing to take and the person who is willing to give the illegal gratification should agree both as to the object for which the gratification is to be given and also as to the shape or form the gratification is to take. When once a proposal has been made for the payment of an illegal gratification whether it is completed by an agreement or not the offence of an attempt to commit an offence under this section is complete.⁸

PRACTICE

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the owner of the property was deprived of it by an offence under the Code.

(2) That the accused took, or agreed, or consented to take, the gratification.

(3) That such gratification was under the pretence of, or on account of, helping to recover such property.

(4) That the accused failed to use all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted.

The prosecution need not prove point (4).⁹

It is not necessary to show that the accused had any connection with the commission of the previous felony; it is sufficient if the evidence satisfies the Court that he had some corrupt and improper design when he received the money; and did not bona fide intend to use such means as he could for the detection and punishment of the offender.¹⁰

A person suspected of theft may, if the prosecution fails to prove the fact of theft by him, be convicted under this section.¹¹ The Rangoon High Court has held that a person charged with the theft of a bullock can in the alternative be charged with demanding an illegal gratification for its return. The Court can convict the accused of either offence even if he is not charged with it. The appellate Court can alter the finding and maintain the sentence.¹² It has also held that there is nothing illegal in the double conviction of the actual thief of moveable property who also takes an illegal gratification for its return to the owner, but it is only in exceptional cases that a more severe sentence should be passed for both offences than would have been inflicted for the theft alone.¹³

Procedure—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—Where the question is likely to arise whether a person who has accepted a gratification for the return of stolen property is the actual thief or not, alternative charges should be framed under s. 236 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.¹⁴

216. Whenever any person convicted of or charged with an offence,¹ being in lawful custody for that offence, escapes from such custody, if the offence is punishable with transportation for life, or imprisonment for ten years, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, with or without fine; and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year⁷ and not to ten years, he shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of the imprisonment provided for such offence, or with fine, or with both.

"Offence" in this section includes also any act or omission of which a person is alleged to have been guilty out of British India which, if he had been guilty of it in British India, would have been punishable as an offence, and for which he is, under any law relating to extradition,⁸ or under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, or otherwise, liable to be apprehended or detained in custody in British India, and every such act or omission shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be punishable as if the accused person had been guilty of it in British India.

Exception.—This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour or concealment is by the husband or wife of the person to be apprehended.

COMMENT.

This section should be compared with s. 212. Section 212 deals with the offence of harbouring an offender who having committed an offence absconds. This section deals with harbouring an offender who has escaped from custody, after being actually convicted of or charged with the offence, or whose apprehension has been ordered; this latter offence is in the eye of the law more aggravated, and a heavier punishment is therefore awarded to it. It is thus an aggravated form of the offence punishable under s. 212.

1. 'Offence'.—This word denotes here anything made punishable by the Code, or by any special or local law, when the thing made punishable by such law is punishable with imprisonment for six months or upwards (s. 40). It has been held by the Chief Court of Oudh that this definition cannot affect the clear provision made in this section for the punishment of a person who harbours an offender. The section provides for the punishment of harbourers only where the person harboured is wanted for an offence for which a maximum sentence of at least one year's imprisonment is provided. No provision is made for the punishment of a harbourer where the person harboured is wanted for an offence punishable with imprisonment of less than one year.¹⁵

2. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

3. 'Orders a certain person to be apprehended for an offence'.—This expression only means that the offence is the causa sine qua non of the apprehension. It is an offence under this section to harbour or conceal a person for whose apprehension an order has been passed by a public servant, even when such apprehension is sought to be made not for the purpose of trying him for an offence that he may have committed, but for enforcing a punishment already inflicted on him for having committed the offence.¹⁶ It is sufficient to show that against the person harboured, orders of apprehension had issued for an offence alleged against him, and the subsequent acquittal of the person harboured cannot affect the legality of a conviction under this section.¹⁷

4. 'Whoever, knowing of such escape or order for apprehension'.—The Privy Council has held that the word 'knowing' means something more than and different from the words 'had reason (or sufficient cause) to believe'. The latter words might be satisfied though no warrant had in fact been issued. 'Knowing' however implies a fact which can be shown. It does not necessarily import actual evidence of the senses, but it does import knowledge of something actual by means of authentic or authoritative information. It must be proved by legal evidence that an order for the arrest of the person alleged to have been harboured was made and that the accused knew of the order and harboured the person concerned with such knowledge.¹⁸

5. 'Harbours or conceals that person with the intention of preventing him from being apprehended'.—See s. 52A, supra, as to the definition of 'harbour'. The word 'harbour' does not only mean to provide shelter, food and clothing but includes the assisting of a person in any way to evade apprehension.¹⁹ Where a proclaimed offender was arrested in the act of cooking his meals at the place of a village Zemindar and the Zemindar was present at the time of the arrest, he was held to have harboured the offender with the knowledge that he was such and with the intention of preventing his apprehension within the meaning of this section.²⁰ A warrant for the arrest of the accused's brother and a proclamation under s. 87, Criminal Procedure Code, were issued. In answer to inquiries by the police at the house of the accused he replied that his brother was in the house and promised to produce him. He then went inside the house and after some delay returned with his brother's son and said that he had made a mistake and that it was the son who had come to the house the preceding evening. On search the accused's brother was found concealed in hiding in the thatch of the roof. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section.²¹ The accused was found sleeping at his threshing floor on the same charpoy with a proclaimed offender and, when questioned by the police, replied that his companion was his guest and nephew. This information was false and was given in order that the offender might not be arrested. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section. The Court observed: "When a person gives false information to the police with respect to a proclaimed offender or warns him of the approach of the police, in order that the said offender may make good his escape, he is guilty of the offence of harbouring him".²² Making a sign to a person on the approach of the police to escape would fall within the purview of this section.²³ The mere giving of a meal to a proclaimed offender is not an offence within the meaning of this section in the absence of any evidence to the effect that the intention of the accused was to prevent the offender from being apprehended.²⁴

The word 'harbour' must be construed liberally. A man charged with an offence might to-day be found in the house of another, and although he might be living in the house owned by that other person, yet if for all practical purposes the harbouring was at the instance of some person not owning the house but visiting him, then this last person is, in law, a person harbouring the accused.²⁵ Where after the police had informed the accused that a certain person who was in the accused's house was a proclaimed offender, the accused denied the fact that that person was in his house and gave prevaricating answers with the object of enabling him to escape, it was held that the conduct of the accused amounted to an offence under this section.¹

6. 'Punishable'.—This word is used merely for the purpose of describing particular classes of offences in relation to which the punishment indicated in the section is to be inflicted; and it does not indicate that in a particular case the offence must have been punished.²

7. 'Punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year'.—The section very clearly provides for the punishment of harbourers only where the person harboured is wanted for an offence for which a maximum sentence of at least one year's imprisonment is provided. No provision whatever is made for the punishment of a harbourer where the man harboured is wanted for an offence punishable with imprisonment for less than one year.³

Amendment.—The paragraph above the Exception was inserted by Act X of 1886, s. 23.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person in question has been convicted of, or charged with, an offence.

- (2) That such person was in lawful custody for the same.
- (3) That such person escaped from such custody.
- (4) That the accused knew of such escape.
- (5) That he with knowledge harboured,⁴ or concealed such offender.
- (6) That he did so, with intent to prevent him from being apprehended.
- (7) That the offence in question was punishable with (a) death, or (b) transportation for life or imprisonment for ten years, or (c) with imprisonment from one to ten years.

Or prove the following points:—

- (1) That a person had been ordered to be apprehended.
- (2) That such order was the order of a public servant.
- (3) That such order was in the lawful exercise of his powers.
- (4) That the accused knew of such order for apprehension.⁵
- (5) }
- (6) } As above.
- (7) }

It must be shown that the warrant to arrest the alleged offender was a legal one.⁶

It is also necessary to prove that the accused knew of the order and harboured the person concerned with such knowledge. A proclamation issued under s. 87 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, reciting that a warrant of arrest had been issued, is not legal evidence of the issue of the warrant and cannot prove the same. Nor is such a proclamation equivalent to notice of its contents either to the public or even to the inhabitants of the place where it is published. The only evidence permitted by law to prove a warrant of arrest is that defined in ss. 62, 64 and 65 of the Evidence Act, viz., either the original order or a certified copy.⁷

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class, if the case comes under the first or second clause; by Magistrate, Presidency or first class, or by Court by which the offence is triable, if the case comes under the third clause.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That on or about the—day of—, at—, one AB was charged with or convicted of an offence under s.—by the Court of—[or one AB was ordered to be apprehended for an offence punishable under s.—by—a public servant in the exercise of his lawful powers as such public servant] and that you knowing of the escape of AB (or knowing of the said order for apprehension) on the—or about—day of—, at—, harboured or concealed AB with the intention of preventing him from being apprehended, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 216 of

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Punishment.—Under the Frontier Crimes Regulation⁸ a person convicted of an offence under this, or the next section, may be sentenced, in lieu of or in addition to fine, to imprisonment or transportation for not more than seven years.

The fact that the person harboured has been acquitted, may be taken into consideration in awarding sentence.⁹

216A. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe¹ that any persons are about to commit or have recently committed robbery² or dacoity,³ harbours⁴ them or any of them, with the intention of facilitating the commission of such robbery or dacoity, or of screening them or any of them from punishment, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section it is immaterial whether the robbery or dacoity is intended to be committed, or has been committed, within or without British India.

Exception.—This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour is by the husband or wife of the offender.

COMMENT.

This section was inserted by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (III of 1894), s. 8. It is specially enacted with a view to enable the Court to inflict enhanced punishment where the persons harboured are robbers or dacoits or where they intend to commit robbery or dacoity. It is not enough that the person charged under this section should be harbouring dacoits in general, but he should be harbouring persons who intend to commit a particular dacoity.¹⁰

Section 212 is a general provision; and an offence under s. 216A will be an offence under s. 212. But in the case of robbers or dacoits this section must be applied.

To justify a conviction under this section both knowledge and intention are required.¹¹

When a person charged with the substantive offence of dacoity or robbery has been acquitted of that offence another person who is said to have intended to screen him from legal punishment in respect of that offence cannot be held guilty of harbouring the alleged offender under this section.¹²

1. 'Reason to believe'.—See s. 26, supra.

2. 'Robbery'.—See s. 390, infra.

3. 'Dacoity'.—See s. 391, infra.

4. 'Harbours'.—See s. 52A, sup.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the persons in question were about to commit or had recently committed robbery or dacoity.

(2) That the accused knew this.

(3) That the accused harboured them or some of them.

(4) That the accused did so with the intention of (a) facilitating the commission of such robbery or dacoity, or (b) screening them or some of them from punishment.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first class.

217. Whoever, being a public servant,¹ knowingly disobeys any direction of the law² as to the way in which he is to conduct himself as such public servant, intending thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby save, any person from legal punishment,³ or subject him to a less punishment than that to which he is liable, or with intent to save, or knowing that he is likely thereby to save, any property from forfeiture or any charge to which it is liable by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Public servant disobeying direction of law with intent to save person from punishment or property from forfeiture.

COMMENT.

This section and the three following sections deal with disobedience on the part of public servants in respect of official duty. Their proper place is in Chapter IX.

This section makes punishable a certain dereliction of duty quite apart from the question as to whether any bribe is paid to induce such dereliction. The dereliction must clearly, from the nature of the definition of the offence, be committed in the discharge of the functions of the person charged.¹³

1. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

2. 'Direction of the law' means "a positive direction of law, such as those contained in ss. 89 and 90 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and cannot be made to extend to the more general obligation by which every subject is bound not to stifle a criminal charge."¹⁴ Before a person can be convicted under this section, it must be shown that there is a direction of law as to the way in which he is to conduct himself as such public servant, and this direction must be a direction to be found in some positive statute or some rules or regulations which are declared by statute to have the force of law.¹⁵ Where a police constable retained for himself a piece of gold in a search for stolen property but not proved to be part of the stolen property and failed to report his possession to his superior officer under s. 523 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁶

3. 'Intending thereby to save... any person from legal punishment'.—"It appears to me quite sufficient, for the purpose of a conviction under s. 217, that the accused has knowingly disobeyed any direction of the law as to the way in which he is to conduct himself as a public servant, and that he should have done this with the intention of saving a person from legal punishment, and that it is not further necessary to show that in point of fact the person so intended to be saved had committed an offence or was justly liable to legal punishment...a public servant charged under that section is equally liable to be punished, although the intention which he had of saving any person from legal punishment was founded upon a mistaken belief as to that person's liability to punishment".¹⁷ Thus, the actual guilt or innocence of the alleged offenders is immaterial, if the accused believes they are guilty, and intends to screen them.¹⁸ It is not necessary to establish that an offence has actually been committed.¹⁹

'Legal punishment' does not include departmental punishment.²⁰

Where several persons were apprehended at night time on suspicion of having committed culpable homicide, the police-officer tied them together by the hands, and kept them in the village in which they had been arrested, instead of at once taking them to the nearest police-station. The accused escaped in the course of the night. It was held that the police-officer did not commit an offence under this section, because his intention in keeping the accused in the village was merely to wait until it was more convenient to start, and the disobedience of the rule of law was, therefore, not such a disobedience as this section contemplates.²¹

The accused, a Police Patel, on a complaint having been made to him that an attempt had been made to commit rape on a girl, made some investigation, prepared a panchnama of the scene of the offence, and arrested the two persons against whom the accusation was laid. He sent them with a report to the police-station, but on the way the parties came to a settlement and all returned to the village. The complainant informed the Patel that he had no desire to continue the proceedings, whereupon the Patel tore up the panchnama which he had made. For this destruction the Patel was convicted of an offence under this section. It was held, acquitting the Patel, that it could not be fairly said that he knowingly disobeyed any direction of the law as to the way in which he should conduct himself or that he intended or knew it to be likely that by tearing up the panchnama he would save any person from legal punishment.²²

A conviction under this section of a village vetti for allowing a person who had been sentenced by a Village Magistrate to escape on the way to the lock-up was held to be bad.²³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused is a public servant.

- (2) That he conducted himself in the particular manner charged.
- (3) That such conduct was in the exercise of his duties as such public servant.
- (4) That such conduct was in disobedience to a direction of law.
- (5) That when the accused disobeyed such direction of law, he did so knowingly.
- (6) That when he was guilty of such disobedience he intended to, or knew that it was likely that he would thereby, save (a) some person from punishment, or subject some person to a less punishment than that to which he was entitled; or (b) some property from forfeiture or a charge to which it was liable; or (c) that such punishment, etc., was legally enforceable, or that such forfeiture, or charge, was a legal liability.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class.

Charge.—It should distinctly state what the direction of law was.²⁴ It should run as follows:—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That on or about the—day of—, at—, you being a public servant knowingly disobeyed the direction of the law as to the way in which you were to conduct yourself as such public servant, to wit—, (specify the direction of law) intending thereby to save—[or knowing it to be likely that you would thereby save—] from legal punishment (or subject him to a less punishment than that to which he was liable or with intent to save or knowing that you were likely thereby to save some property, to wit—, from forfeiture (or any charge to which it is liable by law)], and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 217 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

218. Whoever, being a public servant, and being as such public servant, charged with the preparation of any record or other writing,¹ frames that record or writing in a manner which he knows to be incorrect,² with intent to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, loss or injury to the public or to any person,³ or with intent thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby save, any person from legal punishment,⁴ or with intent to save, or knowing that he is likely thereby to save, any property from forfeiture or other charge to which it is liable by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Public servant framing incorrect record or writing with intent to save person from punishment or property from forfeiture.

COMMENT.

This section deals with the intentional preparation of a false record with the object of saving or injuring any person or property. The correctness of records is of the highest importance to the State and to the public. The intention with which the public servant does the acts mentioned in the section is an essential ingredient of the offence punishable under it.²⁵

Ingredients.—This section has three essentials :—

1. The offender must be a public servant charged with the preparation of a record or writing.
2. He must have framed that record or writing incorrectly.
3. He must have done so with intent to cause or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby
 - (a) cause loss or injury to the public or any person, or
 - (b) save any person from legal punishment, or
 - (c) save any property from forfeiture or other charge to which it is legally liable.

1. 'Whoever, being a public servant . . . charged with the preparation of any record, etc.'—The word 'charge' is not restricted to the narrow meaning of 'enjoined by a special provision of law'. So where a District Superintendent of Police usually required a first information and special diary in gambling cases, it was held that a Sub-Inspector who was given a warrant to arrest certain persons but who framed the information and the diary incorrectly to save two persons from punishment was properly convicted of having committed an offence under this section as he was charged with the preparation of such record within the meaning of it.¹ The public servant framing an incorrect record must have been charged with the preparation of it.

A public servant, in charge as such of certain documents, having been required to produce them, and being unable to do so, fabricated and produced similar documents with the intention of screening himself from punishment. It was held that such fabricated documents not being records or writings with the preparation of which such public servant as such was charged, he could not legally be convicted under this section.²

A pay-sheet drawn up in a railway office and setting out certain sums as due by the railway to certain coolies described as working in a special gang, is a record within the meaning of this section.³

2. 'Frames that record or writing in a manner which he knows to be incorrect.'—It is essential that the record must have been incorrectly made.

3. 'With intent to cause, . . . loss or injury to the public or to any person'.—The section contemplates the wilful falsification of a public document with intent thereby to cause loss or injury and this means by the document itself or by some transaction with which it is essentially connected. The accused must not be convicted on a remote and speculative chain of possibilities, otherwise the most innocent acts might, by the exercise of a little ingenuity, be perverted into the initial steps of great crimes.⁴ Where the accused was charged with having prepared false work bills and the only evidence against him was that he had transposed some men's work from certain days to other days, it was held that the evidence was not sufficient.⁵ Where a chowkidar was charged with having made a false entry in a chowkidaree attendance book, with a view to support a charge which was made against a Sub-Inspector of having made a false report regarding the length of absence from duty of another chowkidar, and thereby to cause loss or injury to the Sub-Inspector, it was held that the intention was too remote to fall within this section.⁶ S was charged with the preparation of a certain record, and was in the habit of preparing it from certain abstracts made and read to him by D. D made and read false abstracts whereby an incorrect record was prepared. It was held that D could not be held to have committed this offence but was guilty of abetting it.⁷

It is not necessary that the incorrect document should be submitted to another person, or be otherwise used by the writer; it is sufficient if it is shown that it has been prepared by a public servant charged with its preparation, in a manner which he knows to be incorrect and with the knowledge that he is thereby likely to cause loss to the public. If, after such preparation, he submits the document, with intent to procure credit for a payment of more than to his knowledge is due to him, all the elements of an attempt to cheat in its simple or aggravated form (ss. 417, 418) would be present; but it does not follow that, because there was not a complete attempt to cheat, there was no complete offence.⁸ As to the definition of 'injury' see s. 44, supra.

4. 'With intent thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby save, any person from legal punishment'.—The words 'any person' mean a person other than the public servant or the public servant himself. If the Legislature had intended that this section should only apply when the intention was to save some person other than the public servant, it would have been easy to insert the word "other" between the words "any" and "person". A public servant who does that which, if done to save another from legal punishment, would bring the public servant within this section, has equally committed the offence punishable under this section if the person whom he intends to save from legal punishment is himself.⁹

"The gist of the section is the stifling of truth and the perversion of the course of justice in cases where an offence has been committed. It is not necessary even to prove the intention to screen any particular person. It is sufficient that he knows it to be likely that justice will not be executed and that some one will escape punishment for the offence."¹⁰

CASES.

Public servant framing incorrect record to save a person from punishment.—A kulkarni who made a false report with reference to an offence committed in his village with intent to save the offenders from punishment was held to have committed this offence.¹³ Where it was proved that the accused's intention in making the false reports was to stave off the discovery of the previous fraud and save himself or the actual perpetrator of that fraud from legal punishment, it was held that he had committed this offence.¹⁴

A report of the commission of a dacoity was made at a thana. The police-officer in charge of the thana took down the report which was made to him, but subsequently destroyed that report and framed another and a false report of the commission of a totally different offence to which he obtained the signature of the complainant, and which he endeavoured to pass off as the original and correct report made to him by the complainant. It was held that the police-officer was guilty of offences punishable under s. 204 and this section.¹⁵ Where a Police Inspector had been charged with framing an incorrect record in that he entered in his diary that certain cartmen told him that "they were not beaten by dacoits", while in fact, they told him that "they were beaten by dacoits", it was held that this was not sufficient to sustain a conviction under this section. But where he, without endeavouring to inquire into the truth of the said entry in his diary, destroyed certain records which falsified it and substituted fresh note-books, his bona fides were open to question and he was deemed to have framed an incorrect public record intentionally.¹⁶ Where a Station House Officer, in order to support the Inspector, made a false entry in his diary, that the "four cartmen stated to him as they had said before the Inspector", he was held guilty of framing an incorrect public record intentionally when it appeared from the evidence that he took no action on the complaint of the cartmen, and his statement that no complaint of dacoity was made to him was falsified by his own witness.¹⁷ The accused, a head constable, whilst investigating a complaint of theft, searched the house of the suspect and found there a piece of cloth and a bodice which the complainant said belonged to him. Statements made by the complainant and his wife claiming the property to be theirs were taken down. The complainant produced from his house some clothes of his own for comparison. Panchnamas were made of the search and the comparison. Subsequently, these papers were suppressed, and the accused prepared statements, purporting to have been made by the complainant and his wife withdrawing the complaint; and a panchnama of the property produced by the complainant which was wrongly supposed to have been stolen from his house was made. The accused was charged with offences punishable under s. 201 and this section. It was held that the accused had not committed an offence under s. 201, but that he was guilty of an offence punishable under this section.¹⁸

Where a patwari, who was bound to make correct entries in the khasra, made a wrong entry knowing that it was wrong and with a criminal intent, it was held that he was guilty of this offence.¹⁹

Incorrect record framed without objects mentioned in this section.—A Village Munsif who submitted a false calendar in which he purported to have convicted certain persons of theft was held to have committed no offence under this section.²⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused is a public servant.

(2) That he was charged with the preparation of record or other writing in his capacity as a public servant.

(3) That he framed such record or other writing in an incorrect manner.

(4) That he then knew that he was framing it in an incorrect manner.

(6) That such punishment was legally enforceable, or that such charge or forfeiture was a legal liability.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That on or about the——day of——, you being a public servant charged with the preparation of a record (or writing, to wit——), framed the said record (or writing) in a manner which you knew to be incorrect (specify the incorrect statement) and which you made with intent to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby cause) loss (or injury) to the public [(or to any person, to wit——) (or with intent thereby to save or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby save any person from legal punishment or with intent to save or knowing that you are thereby likely to save any property, to wit——) from forfeiture to which it was liable by order of the Court in case No.——of——], and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 218 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

219. Whoever, being a public servant,¹ corruptly² or maliciously³ makes or pronounces in any stage of a judicial proceeding,⁴ any report, order, verdict, or decision which he knows to be contrary to law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Public servant in judicial proceeding corruptly making report, etc., contrary to law.

COMMENT.

The essence of an offence under this section is (1) that there must be a judicial proceeding, that is, a proceeding actually commenced and pending, wherein a party claims relief against another and invites the decision of the Court in regard thereto and not a fictitious one where there is no party litigating, and (2) that there must be the making of a real report of a real pronouncement of an order, verdict, or decision.²²

This section must be read with s. 77; it contemplates some wilful excess of authority, in other words, a guilty knowledge superadded to an illegal act.²³

Object.—This and the next section deal with corrupt or malicious exercise of the power vested in a public servant for a particular purpose.

1. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

2. 'Corruptly'.—See s. 196, as to the meaning of this word.

3. 'Maliciously'.—"Malice in common acceptation means ill will against a person, but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act, done intentionally, without just cause or excuse."²⁴ A man acts maliciously when he wilfully and without lawful excuse does that which he knows will injure another in person or property. The term 'maliciously' denotes wicked, perverse and incorrigible disposition.²⁵ It means and implies an intention to do an act which is wrongful, to the detriment of another.¹ Where any person wilfully does an act injurious to another without lawful excuse he does it 'maliciously'.² Whether a person has acted corruptly or maliciously is a question of fact and must be proved. Proof of an unlawful commitment to confinement will not of itself warrant the legal inference of malice.³ The words "corruptly and maliciously" are wide enough to cover confinement for the purpose of extortion. Where a Police Sub-Inspector wrongfully confined certain persons on charges of gambling in futures and extorted money from them by putting them in fear of being prosecuted in Court upon offences which he knew to be false, it was held that the offence fell under this section and not s. 347 or s. 342.⁴ Where a Village Munsif passed a decree which was contrary to law, it was held that he was guilty under this section of maliciously pronouncing a decision.⁵ The keeping in confinement even by a person who had legal authority to do so would be an offence under this section, if in the exercise of that authority a person kept another in confinement knowing that in so doing he was acting contrary to law.⁶

4. 'Judicial proceeding'.—See s. 192, supra. Where a Village Munsif framed an incorrect register of suits filed in his Court by making an entry therein that a certain suit had been filed when in fact it was not so filed and also by making an entry of a judgment purported to have been pronounced when in fact it was not so pronounced, it was held that he was guilty under this section as there was no judicial proceeding or pronouncement of an order.⁷

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused is a public servant.

(2) That he made or pronounced the report, order, verdict or decision.

(3) That he did as in (2) corruptly or maliciously.

(4) That such report, order, verdict, or decision was made or pronounced in the course of a judicial proceeding.

(5) That such report, etc., was contrary to law.

(6) That when the accused made or pronounced the same, he knew it to be contrary to law.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

220. Whoever, being in any office¹ which he gives him legal authority to commit persons for trial or to confinement; or to keep persons in confinement, corruptly or maliciously² commits any person for trial or confinement, or keeps any person in confinement, in the exercise of that authority, knowing that in so doing he is acting contrary to law,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Commitment for trial or confinement by person having authority who knows that he is acting contrary to law.

COMMENT.

This section is a further extension of the principle laid down in the preceding section. It is general in its application whereas the last section applies to judicial officers. It is intended to prevent an illegal commitment for trial or an illegal confinement.

1. 'Being in any office'.—The section applies to those who hold certain offices and not to private persons who have, under certain circumstances, the right to confine persons accused of certain offences.⁴ Private persons, if they abuse their power, cannot be dealt with under this section.

2. 'Maliciously'.—Proof of an unlawful commitment to confinement will not of itself warrant the legal inference of malice.⁵

It is only when there has been an excess, by a police-officer, of his legal powers of arrest, that it becomes necessary to consider whether he has acted corruptly or maliciously, and with the knowledge that he was acting contrary to law. Where the arrest is legal, there can be no guilty knowledge "superadded to an illegal act", such as it is necessary to establish against the accused to justify a conviction under this section.⁹ Apart from the legality of the arrest, the keeping in confinement even by a person who had legal authority to do so would be an offence under this section, if in the exercise of that authority a person kept another in confinement knowing that in doing so he was acting contrary to law.¹⁰

3. 'Knowing that in so doing he is acting contrary to law'.—When the question is of illegal commitment knowledge that such commitment is contrary to law is a question of fact and not of law and must be proved in order to satisfy the requirement of this section.¹¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused held an office, which empowered him to (a) commit persons for trial; or (b) commit persons to confinement; or (c) keep persons in confinement.

(2) That he committed a person for trial or to confinement, or kept a person in confinement in exercise of such powers.

(3) That he, in doing as above, was acting contrary to law.

(4) That he at the time knew that he was acting contrary to law.

(5) That he when doing as in (2) also acted corruptly or maliciously.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

221. Whoever, being a public servant,¹ legally bound² as such public servant to apprehend or to keep in confinement any person charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence,³ intentionally omits to apprehend such person, or intentionally suffers such person to escape, or intentionally aids such person in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement, shall be punished as follows, that is to say:—

with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, an offence punishable with death; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, an offence punishable with transportation for life or imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term less than ten years.

COMMENT.

This and the two following sections deal with the omission to apprehend the escape of offenders.

1. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

2. 'Legally bound'.—See s. 43, supra. There must be a legal obligation to apprehend or to keep in confinement any person charged with an offence. A chowkidar is not legally bound as a public servant to apprehend a person accused of committing murder outside the village of which he is chowkidar, such a person not being a proclaimed offender, and, not having been found by him in the act of committing such murder; and consequently such chowkidar, if he refuse to apprehend such person on such charge at the instance of a private person, is not punishable under this section.¹² Where a village chowkidar caught a person committing theft at a place which was beyond the chowkidar's circle, and detained the thief for some time and then released him on receiving some money, it was held that the chowkidar could not be convicted under this section, inasmuch as it was not the statutory duty of the chowkidar to arrest or detain the thief. He was not legally bound under s. 54 or 59 of the Criminal Procedure Code to do so.¹³ But where a police constable allowed a man who committed murder in his presence to escape because he was afraid of arresting him, it was held that he was guilty under this section.¹⁴

3. 'Offence'.—A thing punishable under the Code or under any special or local law (s. 40).

Special Act.—Where a police-officer allowed a prisoner to escape from his custody while he was on duty as sentry, it was held that he could not be convicted under the Police Act (V of 1861), but under this section.¹⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused is a public servant.

(2) That the person in question had been charged with an offence; or that such person was liable to be apprehended for an offence.

(3) That the accused was legally bound to apprehend such person for the same.

(4) That he omitted to apprehend.

(5) That he did so intentionally.

Prove also that the offence for which such person is charged with, etc., is punishable (a) with death; or (b) with transportation for life or imprisonment up to ten years; or (c) with imprisonment for less than ten years.

Or prove the following points:—

(1) That the accused is a public servant.

(2) That the person in question was in confinement for an offence.

(3) That the accused was legally bound to keep such person in such confinement.

(4) That he suffered such person to escape, or aided such person in escaping or in the attempt to escape.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, if the case comes under the first clause; by a Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or first class Magistrate, if it comes under the second; by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class, if it comes under the third.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—, at—, being a public servant (state the nature of office held by the prisoner so as to make him a public servant) legally bound as such public servant to keep in confinement AB charged with the offence of—, an offence punishable with (state the punishment) intentionally suffered such person to escape, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 221 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.¹⁶

For the second paragraph the following may be substituted :—

That you being a public servant, to wit—, and being as such public servant legally bound to apprehend (or keep in confinement) one AB, who was, on or about the—day of—, at—, charged with (or liable to be apprehended for) the offence of —, punishable with—, did intentionally omit to apprehend such person [or intentionally suffer the said AB to escape or intentionally aid the said AB in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement;] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 221 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

222. Whoever, being a public servant,¹ legally bound² as such Intentional omission to apprehend on the part of public servant bound to apprehend person under sentence or lawfully committed.

public servant to apprehend or to keep in confinement any person under sentence of a Court of Justice³ for any offence⁴ or lawfully committed to custody, intentionally omits to apprehend such person, or intentionally suffers such person to escape, or intentionally aids⁵ such person in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement, shall be punished as follows, that is to say :—

with transportation for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years. with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, is under sentence of death ; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, is subject, by a sentence of a Court of Justice, or by virtue of a commutation of such sentence, to transportation for life or pénal servitude for life, or to transportation or penal servitude or imprisonment for a term of ten years or upwards ; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended is subject, by a sentence of a Court of Justice, to imprisonment for a term not extending to ten years or if the person was lawfully committed to custody.

COMMENT.

This section is similar to the last section with the exception that the person to be apprehended has already been convicted or committed for an offence. It is thus an aggravated form of the offence made punishable by the last section.

1. 'Public servant'—See s. 21, supra.

2. 'Legally bound'—See s. 43, supra.

3. 'Court of Justice'.—See s. 20, supra.

4. 'Offence'.—'Offence' means a thing punishable under the Code or under any special or local law (s. 40).

5. 'Intentionally aids'.—The meaning of this phrase can be learnt from s. 107, Explan. 2, where it is explained that whoever either prior to or at the time of the commission of an act does anything in order to facilitate the commission of that act and thereby facilitates the commission thereof is said to aid the doing of that act.¹⁷

Amendment.—The words “or lawfully committed to custody” in the first paragraph, and “or if the person was lawfully committed to custody” at the end were inserted by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (XXVII of 1870), s. 8.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused is a public servant.

- (2) That the person in question was sentenced by a Court of Justice.
- (3) That such sentence was for an offence committed.
- (4) That such person was liable to be apprehended under such sentence.
- (5) That the accused was legally bound to apprehend such person.
- (6) That he omitted to apprehend.
- (7) That he did so intentionally.

Or prove points (1), (2) and (3) as above, and further—

- (4) That such person was in confinement under such sentence.
- (5) That the accused was legally bound to keep him in such confinement.
- (6) That he suffered such person to escape, or aided him in escaping or in the attempt to escape.
- (7) That he did so intentionally.

Prove also the offence for which such person was confined.

Or prove the following points :—

- (1) That the accused is a public servant.
- (2) That the person in question had been committed to custody.
- (3) That such committal was lawful.
- (4) That the accused was legally bound to keep him in confinement under such committal.
- (5) That he suffered such person to escape, or aided him in escaping or in the attempt to escape.
- (6) That he did so intentionally.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable if the case is punishable under the first or second clause; bailable if under the third clause—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session if the case falls under the first or second clause; by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class, if it falls under the third.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, being a public servant, to wit—, and being as such public servant legally bound to apprehend (or keep in confinement) one AB, who was, on or about the—day of—, at—, under the sentence of the Court of—for the offence of—(or who was lawfully committed to custody by—) did intentionally omit to apprehend the said AB (or intentionally suffer the said AB to escape, or intentionally aid the said AB in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 222 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)) on the said charge.

223. Whoever, being a public servant¹ legally bound as such public servant to keep in confinement any person charged with or convicted of any offence or lawfully committed to custody,² negligently suffers such person to escape from confinement,³ shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Escape from confinement or custody negligently suffered by public servant.

COMMENT.

This section further extends the principle laid down in the two preceding sections. It punishes a public servant who negligently suffers any person charged with an offence to escape from confinement. The last two sections deal with intentional omission to apprehend such person.

Scope.—This section applies only to cases where the person, who is allowed to escape is in custody for an offence, or has been committed to custody, and not to cases where such person has merely been arrested, under civil process.¹⁸ The latter cases come under s. 225A.

Ingredients.—The section has three essentials :—

1. The offender must be a public servant.
2. He must be legally bound to keep in confinement a person charged with or convicted of an offence or lawfully committed to custody.
3. He must negligently suffer such person to escape.

1. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra. The expression includes a convict warder,¹⁹ or a rakha,²⁰ but not a village vetti.²¹

2. 'Legally bound . . . to keep in confinement any person charged with or convicted of any offence or lawfully committed to custody'.—See s. 48, supra, as to the meaning of 'legally bound'. The public servant must be legally bound to keep in confinement. A village policeman is nowhere authorized to take charge of convicted prisoners. Where, therefore, a convicted prisoner escaped from the custody of a village policeman, it was held that the policeman was not guilty of an offence under this section.²²

'Any person charged with or convicted of any offence'.—The words "charged with an offence" in this section are used only in the sense of inculcation or accusation of an offence and do not mean "against whom a charge has been framed". Where an officer who was not a police-officer, and 'therefore not legally bound' to keep in confinement a person arrested by a private person for an offence, negligently suffered that person to escape from confinement, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section.²³

'Offence' means a thing punishable under the Code or under any special or local law (s. 40).

'Lawfully committed to custody'.—Unless the custody is lawful no offence is committed. If a public servant has no right to keep a person in custody he is not guilty of an offence under this section for allowing that person to escape.²⁴ The police of a Native State arrested in British territory a person suspected of having committed an offence in that State, and made him over to a chowkidar from whose custody he escaped. It was held that as neither the original arrest nor the subsequent custody by the chowkidar was lawful, the chowkidar could not be convicted under this section.²⁵

3. 'Negligently suffers such person to escape from confinement'.—Before a person can be convicted of having negligently suffered a prisoner to escape, it must be shown not only that he was guilty of negligence, but that the escape was at least the natural and probable consequence of his negligence. It must be shown that the escape was directly due to negligence. Where an officer in charge of a police-station was ordered to despatch certain prisoners and he left the station ordering the head constable to despatch them and on the way the prisoners escaped, it was held that the negligence of the officer in charge was too remotely connected with the escape and he could not be convicted under this section.¹ Where the accused, a jail warder, was placed in charge of a gang of prisoners to do agricultural work, contrary to his orders, permitted a convict warder to take two of the convicts to a cemetery to water the trees there and one of the convicts escaped owing to the negligence of the convict warder, it was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.² Where the accused marched a prisoner after sunset, contrary to the directions of the Magistrate, and the prisoner was rescued, it was held that no offence under this section was made out.³ Certain police constables were conveying a dangerous prisoner in a camel-cart. The constables had put on the prisoner two sets of hand-cuffs. One set bound his hands together and by the other set he was bound to a side of the camel-cart. There was also a rope round the prisoner's waist. During the course of the journey the prisoner demanded to be let down from the car to answer the call of nature. One set of hand-cuffs was taken off in order to enable the prisoner to leave the camel-cart for the purpose mentioned. The rope remained round his waist and one set of hand-cuffs remained in his hands. The prisoner raised a sudden alarm of a snake and in the momentary confusion jerked away the rope and managed to get away. The night was cloudy and the prisoner could not be caught. It was held that the policemen were not guilty of negligence, even though somewhat inefficient, and were not guilty of an offence under this section.⁴

'Escape from confinement'.—"It seems . . . that the Legislature, in ss. 220 to 225, has used the words confinement and custody as co-extensive, and indicates by them one and the same thing, regarded from different points of view".⁵ "We cannot hold that the expression 'escape from confinement' should be limited in its application to escape from the particular sort or place of confinement to which the prisoner was subjected or in which he was restrained at the time of the occurrence".⁶ The accused were keeping guard on certain cells in a jail where certain condemned prisoners were confined. When they were relieved it transpired that the prisoners under their charge were not in their cells. They were, however, subsequently discovered crouching on the roofs of their cells, and were immediately recaptured. It was held that the accused were not guilty of this offence. For "the prisoners were still in 'confinement' when crouching upon the roofs of their cells, inasmuch as they were still within the prison walls and were not at liberty. An attempt to escape from confinement had no doubt been made, but negligently suffering such an attempt is not an offence within the provision of s. 223".⁷ A Magistrate, acting upon a petition, arrested and took the statement of the prisoner. He then sent the prisoner to a police-officer for investigation and report, who allowed the prisoner to go at large. It was held that the Magistrate's order might be taken to have been passed under s. 167, Criminal Procedure Code, and therefore the prisoner was lawfully committed to the custody of the police; that the officer was bound to detain him in custody until released therefrom by due course of law, and that the officer, having negligently suffered the prisoner to escape, was guilty under this section.⁸ The accused, a daffadar in charge of one of the postern gates of a jail, suffered certain convicts to pass out of the gate at which he was stationed, not intending that they should escape but to allow of their having an interview with their friends. The convicts taking advantage of the accused's overconfidence effected their escape. It was held that the accused was guilty of this offence.⁹

Amendment.—The words "or lawfully committed to custody" were added by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (XXVII of 1870), s. 8.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused is a public servant.

- (2) That the person in question was charged with or convicted of an offence.
- (3) That the accused was legally bound to keep such person in confinement.
- (4) That he suffered such person to escape therefrom.
- (5) That he acted negligently when suffering such person to escape.¹⁰

Or prove (1) that the accused is a public servant.

- (2) That the person in question was committed to custody.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, being a public servant, to wit——, and as such public servant legally bound to keep in confinement one AB who was charged with the offence of——, under section——, of the Indian Penal Code, (or convicted of, or lawfully committed to custody) negligently suffered the said AB to escape from confinement, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 223 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

224. Whoever intentionally offers any resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of himself for any offence with which he is charged¹ or of which he has been convicted, or escapes or attempts to escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained for any such offence,² shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.—The punishment in this section is in addition to the punishment for which the person to be apprehended or detained in custody was liable for the offence with which he was charged, or of which he was convicted.

COMMENT.

This and the section following relate to resistance or illegal obstruction offered to the lawful apprehension of any person. Sections 221-223 punish public servants who fail to apprehend or confine persons liable to be apprehended or confined.

Scope.—This section punishes the persons who offer resistance or obstruction to their lawful apprehension. It requires that the accused person must offer resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of himself for any offence with which he has either been charged or of which he has been convicted.¹¹

Ingredients.—The section deals with two kinds of offences :—

1. Resistance or illegal obstruction by a person to his lawful apprehension for any offence with which he is charged.

2. Escape or attempt to escape by a person from lawful custody for the offence with which he is charged or of which he has been convicted.

1. 'Resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension... for any offence with which he is charged'.—The prosecution should show that the apprehension or arrest made or attempted was lawful in every way.¹² Trivial resistance to unlawful force on the part of an arresting officer does not constitute an offence under this section.¹³

The accused committed contempt of Court and was ordered into custody by the presiding Magistrate. He resisted the arrest, but was ultimately arrested in a Court on a warrant issued by the Magistrate, and was tried and convicted of the offence of resisting lawful arrest. It was held that the conviction was legal.¹⁴ Where the accused having been sentenced to imprisonment by a Village Magistrate refused to submit to the sentence and went away, and the evidence did not show that any proper attempt was made to arrest her, it was held that the conviction under this section was bad.¹⁵

'Illegal obstruction'.—The simple evading of arrest does not amount to resistance or illegal obstruction to lawful apprehension.¹⁶ As to the word "illegal", see s. 43, supra.

'Offence'.—'Offence' means a thing punishable under the Code or any special or local law (s. 40). Escapes by parties detained for offences not punishable under the Code are punishable under this section.¹⁷

'Charged'.—An arrest of a person by an officer authorized in that behalf is a charging, that is, an imputation of the alleged offence though but a prima facie imputation until the case goes before some functionary authorized to deal with it.¹⁸ The word "charged" is used in the popular sense as implying inculpation of an alleged offence as distinguished from a charge formulated after trial.¹⁹ But the mere fact that a Sub-Inspector of Police put his hand on the shoulder of the accused or caught hold of his wrist without the least intimation to him for what offence he was being arrested cannot amount to the accused being "charged" with an offence under this section.²⁰

2. 'Escapes or attempts to escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained for any such offence'.—A man legally arrested for an offence must submit to be tried and dealt with according to law. If he gains his liberty before he is delivered by due course of law he commits the offence of escape.²¹ Thus, where a person, having been legally arrested, was subsequently left unguarded and he escaped, it was held that he was guilty under this section.²² Manual detention is not essential to constitute arrest.²³

'Custody in which he is lawfully detained'.—In construing these words regard must be had to the nature of the custody itself as well as to the circumstances under which the authority to arrest and keep in custody arises.²⁴ The mere fact that a constable in charge of the accused, who was detained in a jail, became insensible was held not to determine the lawful custody of the accused.²⁵

Where a person apprehended on a charge of a cognizable offence, escapes from lawful custody, his liability to punishment is not affected by the circumstances that a competent Court determines his offence to be other than that with which he has been charged. But, if charged with a non-cognizable offence, the police-officer, who apprehends him without warrant does not have him in lawful custody, and his escape is not punishable under this section.¹

A person is not in lawful custody if the person apprehending him or causing his apprehension has no power to arrest,² or if he is arrested on a warrant, not lawfully signed,³ or by a person who cannot legally arrest, e.g. a chowkidar,⁴ or if he is kept in confinement for inflicting illegal punishment.⁵

A person of the same name as the offender was arrested, tried and acquitted. Whilst under arrest the accused escaped from custody. It was held that he was not liable to conviction under this section.⁶ Where a prisoner escaped from lawful custody while on his way to undergo a sentence of transportation, he was held liable under this section and not under s. 226.⁷ Escape from custody by a thief, who had been caught by a private person in the very act of stealing, at a time when the thief was being sent to the nearest police-station in custody of a person, who had not witnessed the offence, was held to be an offence under this section.⁸ A prisoner in a jail was employed in brickfields outside the jail. While so employed he endeavoured to escape, but was recaptured. It was held that he had committed an offence under this section.⁹ A process-server went to the village of the accused and told him that he had a warrant for him and took him before the Village Magistrate, who then read out the warrant to the accused. The process-server informed him that he should pay the amount. The accused's offer to pay a less sum than that mentioned in the warrant having been refused, he ran away. It was held that the accused was duly arrested and was in the custody of the process-server at the time he made his escape.¹⁰

'For any such offence.'—These words mean, for any offence with which a person is charged or of which he has been convicted. So that it will be an offence for a man to escape from custody after he has been lawfully arrested on a charge of having committed an offence although he may not be convicted of such latter offence. An accused person is no less guilty than a convicted person, if he escapes from lawful custody.¹¹ Escape from custody when such detention is not for an offence is not punishable under this section.¹² The detention contemplated should necessarily be for any of the offences mentioned in the Code or under any local or special law applicable to British India. If the detention is in respect of an offence committed in an Indian State it is not a detention which could be taken notice of under this section. The accused, a subject of an Indian State, was lawfully arrested by the State police within the State territory for an offence committed by him there. While in such custody, he passed through the British territory and escaped. He was arrested by the British police, and prosecuted and convicted under this section. It was held that the detention contemplated in this section should necessarily be for any of the offences mentioned in the Code or under any local or special law applicable to British India, and that the accused could not be convicted under this section as he was detained at the time of his escape by the State police for an offence committed within the State territory.¹³

An escape from custody, when a person is being taken before a Magistrate for the purpose of being bound over to keep good behaviour, is not punishable under this section¹⁴ for in such a case he is not in custody for an offence. He could, however, be punished under s. 225B.

Escape with consent.—Even when the escape is effected by the consent or the neglect of the person that kept the prisoner in custody, the latter is no less guilty, as neither such illegal consent nor neglect absolves the prisoner from the duty of submitting to the judgment of the law.¹⁵

Police-officer to show authority under which he is acting.—It may be desirable or even obligatory that if called upon the police-officer making an arrest should show the person arrested the authority under which he is acting; but to hold that he is bound to do so before he can properly arrest and detain in custody such a person, so as to make the arrest and the detention lawful, would be to extend the law beyond what the Legislature has thought proper to declare it.¹⁶

An endorsement in a warrant of arrest should be made properly in accordance with law. If it is made only by initials which are proved or identified to be of the proper person the warrant does not become invalid by reason merely of its being initialled.¹⁷

Explanation.—The Explanation does not require that a sentence of imprisonment under this section must be made to run consecutively to a sentence imposed for the main offence of which the accused has been convicted.¹⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—When the offence charged is that of resistance to apprehension, prove—

- (1) That the accused is charged with an offence.
- (2) That he offered resistance or obstruction to his apprehension.
- (3) That such resistance or obstruction was illegal.
- (4) That the accused offered it intentionally.

When the offence charged is that of escape from custody, prove—

- (1) That the accused had been charged with or convicted of an offence.
- (2) That he was detained in custody.
- (3) That such detention in custody was in respect of such charge or conviction.
- (4) That such detention in custody was lawful.
- (5) That the accused escaped from such custody or attempted to do so.
- (6) That the accused did so intentionally.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class.

Venue.—A charge of having escaped from custody may be inquired into and tried wherever the person happens to be when the charge is made.¹⁹

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, [intentionally offered resistance (or illegal obstruction) to your lawful apprehension for the offence of—with which you were charged (or of which you had been convicted)] (or) [escaped or attempted to escape from the custody of—— in which you were lawfully detained for the offence of——], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 224 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

Punishment.—The punishment awardable under this section being in addition to the original sentence, the Courts, when passing a sentence, must comply with the directions of s. 396 (2), (3), of the Code of Criminal Procedure.²⁰

225. Whoever intentionally offers any resistance¹ or illegal² obstruction to the lawful apprehension of any other person for an offence, or rescues³ or attempts to rescue any other person from any custody in which that person is lawfully detained⁴ for an offence,⁵ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both;

or, if the person to be apprehended or the person rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence punishable with transportation for life or imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine; or, if the person to be apprehended, or rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence punishable with death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

or, if the person to be apprehended or rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is liable under the sentence of a Court of Justice, or by virtue of a commutation of such a sentence, to transportation for life, or to transportation, penal servitude, or imprisonment, for a term of ten years or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine; or, if the person to be apprehended or rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is under sentence of death, shall be punished with transportation for life or imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

This section punishes a person who—

(1) intentionally offers resistance or obstruction to the lawful apprehension of an offender; or

(2) rescues or attempts to rescue a person from any custody in which he is lawfully detained for an offence.

The last section punishes the offenders themselves. Section 130 deals with the rescue of a prisoner of State or War, and s. 186, with rescue in any other case.

1. 'Intentionally offers... resistance'.—The intention of the accused is an important ingredient in the offence. If the apprehension is not lawful then resistance to such apprehension will not be any offence. Where a police-officer sent villagers to arrest certain persons suspected of theft, contrary to the Code of Criminal Procedure which confers no powers on a police-officer to send persons who are not police-officers to make an arrest which he could lawfully make, it was held that resistance to the villagers did not constitute an offence under this section.²¹ A person who offers resistance or obstruction to the arrest by a private person of another person, who is escaping after the commission of a non-bailable and cognizable offence but who did not commit the offence in view of the person attempting to arrest him, cannot be held to have committed an offence under this section.²² Where a Sub-Inspector of Police went to a village dressed up in his uniform to arrest the accused in a most illegal and reprehensible manner, it was held that the accused could not be held guilty under this section if they offered resistance to the police.²³

Where a Sub-Inspector of Excise was threatened in order to prevent him from arresting an offender, it was held that it amounted to offering resistance and illegal obstruction to arrest.²⁴

2. 'Illegal'.—See s. 43, supra.

3. 'Rescues'.—This word is not defined in the Code. 'Rescue' is the act of forcibly freeing a person from custody against the will of those who have him in custody. If the person rescued is in the custody of a private person, the offender must have notice of the fact that the person rescued is in such custody.²⁵ 'Rescue' implies intention and the use of violence to effect the object desired.¹ The act of rescue will always be accomplished by the use of a certain amount of criminal force. A person, under such circumstances, cannot be convicted of both rescuing another person and using force.² A person rescuing a prisoner arrested by a police-officer as a member of an unlawful assembly,³ and a person rescuing a thief from the custody of a private person who had arrested him, in the act of stealing,⁴ or from the custody of a chowkidar to whom a private person had handed over the thief after arresting him,⁵ were held to have committed an offence under this section.

4. 'Lawfully detained'.—The person from whose custody the rescue is effected must have authority to lawfully detain the person rescued. Otherwise no offence is committed for effecting the rescue.⁶ It is not necessary that the custody from which the offender is rescued should be that of a policeman, it is enough that the custody is one which is authorized by law,⁷ and it must be proved that the person rescued was in lawful custody at the time.⁸ Otherwise no offence is committed. The accused rescuing a person alleged to have committed theft, who was unlawfully arrested by a private person and made over to the custody of a village chowkidar, not a police-officer, was held to have committed no offence under this section.⁹ But in virtue of the amendment of s. 59, Criminal Procedure Code, by the introduction of the words "or cause him to be taken in custody" such a defence cannot now be raised and a chowkidar has power to receive the custody of a person arrested under s. 59 by a private individual and to take him to the police-station and rescue from such custody amounts to an offence under this section.¹⁰ Where a person was arrested by a private person not while committing theft but only when hiding himself in a house, it was held that his arrest was not lawful and consequently his rescue from the custody of the person arresting him did not constitute an offence under this section.¹¹ On a warrant which provided for bail a constable arrested a person without giving him intimation that bail had been allowed. He was rescued by a number of persons who assaulted the constable. It was held that as the constable arrested him without asking him whether he could give bail he was not in lawful custody and his rescue therefore did not constitute any offence.¹² The seal of the Court is essential to the validity of a warrant, and its absence makes the warrant void and an arrest made in execution of such warrant is not legal.¹³ A civil warrant not addressed to a particular bailiff by name but addressed "to the bailiff of the Court" is not invalid. The rescuer of a person arrested under such warrant was held guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁴ If the person rescuing another who is arrested under an illegal warrant uses more force than is necessary and causes unnecessary hurt to the public servant who has the custody of that person, he will be punished under s. 353.¹⁵

If a person authorized to arrest has made an arrest and handed over the person arrested to the custody of an agent, such custody continues to be, what it originally was, a lawful custody.¹⁶

5. 'Offence'.—'Offence' means a thing punishable under the Code or any special or local law (s. 40). An escape from custody, when being taken before a Magistrate for the purpose of being bound over to be of good behaviour, is not punishable under this section.¹⁷ Similarly, an escape from arrest under s. 55, Criminal Procedure Code, will not fall under this section.¹⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person in question was detained in custody.

(2) That such detention was in respect of an offence.

(3) That such detention was lawful.

(4) That the accused rescued or attempted to rescue such person.

(5) That he did so intentionally.

There must be a clear finding as to the intention with which the accused acted.¹⁹

Prove further that the case falls under a particular clause of the section.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable, if the case falls under the first clause, otherwise not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class, if the case falls under the first clause; but by Court of Session, or by Magistrate, Presidency or first class, if it falls under the second; by Court of Session, if it falls under any of the remaining clauses.

Jurisdiction.—The words in the second paragraph of this section, describing the punishment for the offence with which the person apprehended is charged, should not be read disjunctively as denoting transportation for life or imprisonment for ten years in the alternative. A Second Class Magistrate has therefore no jurisdiction to try an offender under s. 225(2), if the person to be apprehended or attempted to be rescued is liable to be apprehended for, or is charged with, an offence punishable with transportation for life, or an offence punishable with imprisonment for ten years.²⁰

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, intentionally offered resistance (or illegal obstruction) to the lawful apprehension of AB for the offence of ——under section—— of the Indian Penal Code [or rescued (or attempted to rescue) the said AB from the custody in which the said AB was lawfully detained for the offence of——], and that you thereby committed an offence under s. 225, clause ——, of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance [or the cognizance of the Court of Session].

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (omit these words when the accused is tried by a Magistrate)] on the said charge.

225A. Whoever, being a public servant¹ legally bound² as such public servant to apprehend, or to keep in confinement, any person in any case not provided for in section 221, section 222 or section 223, or in any other law for the time being in force, omits to apprehend that person or suffers him to escape from confinement, shall be punished—

Omission to apprehend, or suffering of escape, on part of public servant, in cases not otherwise provided for.

(a) if he does so intentionally, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both; and

(b) if he does so negligently, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section was substituted by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (X of 1886), s. 24 (1), for the old s. 225A which was inserted by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (XXVII of 1870), s. 9. It punishes intentional or negligent omission to apprehend or keep in confinement on the part of a public servant not coming within the purview of s. 221, 222 or 223. Where a police-officer who was entrusted with the custody of an arrested person omitted to secure one of the doors of the room in which that person was confined and the prisoner escaped through that door, it was held that the officer was clearly guilty of negligence under this section.²¹

A person who intentionally resists or illegally obstructs a police-officer in the apprehension of a deserter from His Majesty's Army or rescues or attempts to rescue him from the custody of such officer commits an offence under this section.²²

Chapter IV (General Exceptions) and Chapter V (Abetment) of the Code apply to offences punishable under this section.

1. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra. 2. 'Legally bound'.—See s. 43, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused is a public servant.

(2) That he was legally bound to apprehend, or keep in confinement, the person in question.

(3) That he omitted to apprehend that person, or suffered him to escape from confinement.

(4) That he did as above intentionally [or negligently for clause (b)].

(5) That the offence does not fall under s. 221, 222 or 223 or any other law.

Procedure.—(a) In the case of intentional omission or sufferance—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

(b) In the case of negligent omission or sufferance—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, being a public servant legally bound as such public servant to apprehend (or to keep in confinement) one AB intentionally (or negligently) omitted to apprehend the said AB (or suffered the said AB to escape from confinement) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 225A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

225B. Whoever, in any case not provided for in section 224

Resistance or obstruction to lawful apprehension, or escape or rescue in cases not otherwise provided for.

or section 225 or in any other law for the time being in force, intentionally offers any resistance or illegal obstruction¹ to the lawful apprehension² of himself or of any other person, or escapes or attempts to escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained,³ or rescues or attempts to rescue any other person from any custody⁴ in which that person is lawfully detained, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section was substituted by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (X of 1886), s. 24 (1).

Chapters IV (General Exceptions) and V (Abetment) of the Code apply to offences punishable under this section.

Object.—This section was introduced to provide for cases referred to in *Empress v. Shasti Churn Napi*²³ and *Queen-Empress v. Kandhaia*²⁴ in which it was held that a person escaping from custody when being taken before a Magistrate for the purpose of being bound over to be of good behaviour not being punishable under s. 224 or 225 could not be punished, and for cases which s. 651 of the old Code of Civil Procedure was intended to meet.

1. 'Intentionally offers any resistance or illegal obstruction'.—See s. 43, supra, for the meaning of 'illegal'. Resistance to arrest must be intentional. A person who makes a resistance not knowing that he is being, or is about to be, arrested, cannot be convicted of an offence under this section.²⁵ Where a warrant is issued by a civil

Court for the arrest of a judgment-debtor and he resists the officer executing the warrant in making the arrest he will be guilty of an offence under this section. But if the judgment-debtor on seeing the officer runs into the house and thus avoids the arrest, it does not amount to intentional resistance or obstruction to arrest. There must be an overt act of resistance or obstruction which can justify a conviction under this section.¹ There must be some active opposition by show of force. Something more than mere absconding is required.² In order to constitute an offence under this section something more is required than an evasion of arrest or a mere assertion by the person sought to be arrested that he would not like to be arrested or that a fight would be the result of such arrest.³

Though absconding in order to avoid being served with a summons, notice or order, is punishable, no provision exists for punishing absconding in order to avoid arrest under a warrant. The law provides certain alternative coercive procedure against the property of the absconder in such a case.⁴

2. 'Lawful apprehension'.—The warrant under which a person is to be apprehended must be a legal one, that is, it must have been executed with all due formalities of law.⁵ If the warrant is illegal, then resistance to the execution of such a warrant is not an offence. Where, therefore, a warrant was issued for the arrest of a witness in the first instance without previously serving summons upon him, for attendance and without recording reasons for the issue of the warrant and the witness was arrested, it was held that the resistance to the execution of such a warrant was not an offence.⁶ If the arrest is not lawful then no offence under this section is committed.⁷ When the imposition of tax for the non-payment of which a warrant is issued is itself illegal and ultra vires, the resistance to its execution is not punishable under this section.⁸

Obstruction to the apprehension of a person who cannot be lawfully arrested, cannot be an offence under this section, e.g. a child under seven years,⁹ or searching and taking a person into custody from a place different from that specified in the search-warrant.¹⁰

The evading of arrest does not amount to resistance or illegal obstruction to lawful apprehension.¹¹ Where the accused, seeing a process-server accompanied by the decree-holder coming with a warrant to arrest him in execution of a decree, ran into his house and would not come out when called upon to do so, it was held that this did not amount to resistance or obstruction within the meaning of this section.¹² Where two peons arrived with a warrant of arrest, complete in itself and exhibiting no defect of form, and arrested the judgment-debtor, but did not do anything more than the duties imposed upon them by the warrant, nor did they act otherwise than in good faith, and the judgment-debtor resisted the arrest while the other two accused persons pushed the two peons aside whereupon the judgment-debtor also pulled himself free of their grasp, it was held that although the executing Court might have wrongly exercised the discretion in issuing the warrant of arrest, nevertheless it was the duty of the peons to execute that warrant and it was no part of their duty to ascertain whether the executing Court had properly exercised its undoubted legal discretion, and, therefore, that the apprehension of the judgment-debtor by the peons was a lawful one and escape from and obstruction to that apprehension were unlawful acts, and the accused persons were guilty under this section and s. 353.¹³

Resistance to improper warrant justifiable.—It is illegal to convict a person under this section and s. 353 when the warrant attempted to be executed was addressed to the person with a wrong description to which the accused did not answer,¹⁴ or when it was executed by an incompetent person,¹⁵ or when it did not contain the name of the person to be apprehended,¹⁶ or when it was void as it did not bear the seal of the Court issuing it,¹⁷ or when it was defective as the person who directed the peons to make the arrest was not authorised to do so,¹⁸ or when it did not give the name or designation of the person to whom it was issued for execution,¹⁹ or when it was signed by an officer who was not legally empowered to sign it,²⁰ or where it was not addressed to the bailiff of the Court as required by Sch. IV of the old Civil Procedure Code,²¹ or where it was endorsed to the Munsif instead of to the District Court as required by s. 136, Civil Procedure Code.²² Similarly, it is illegal to convict persons under this section for resisting a search carried on under a defective search-warrant.²³

If a warrant is not signed by the Judge of the Court purporting to issue the warrant, it is necessary that it should be shown either on the face of the signature itself or by evidence that the officer by whom the warrant purported to be signed had been appointed in that behalf.²⁴

Resistance to arrest without notifying substance of warrant justifiable.—

An arrest by a police-officer without notifying the substance of the warrant to the person against whom the warrant is issued as required by s. 80, Criminal Procedure Code, is not a lawful arrest, and resistance to such an arrest is no offence under this section.²⁵ Where a person is arrested without a summons or a warrant having been issued, the arrest is unauthorised and such person commits no offence in escaping from custody.¹

Bailiff must show warrant to person arrested.—To make an arrest under a warrant issued in execution of a civil Court decree valid it may not be necessary to show the warrant to the person to be arrested, but it is the duty of the bailiff to acquaint the person with the contents of the warrant at the time he arrests him and that he was authorized to arrest him, and if the accused wants to see the warrant it would be the duty of the bailiff to show it to him. If a warrant is not shown to the person arrested nor are the contents of the warrant notified to him, before or at the time of the arrest, there is no lawful arrest.²

3. 'Escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained'.—A man legally arrested for an offence must submit to be tried and dealt with according to law. If he gains his liberty before he is delivered by due course of law he commits the offence of escape.³ A peon who arrested the accused under a civil warrant made him sleep by his side in a house after nightfall. The accused escaped while the peon was asleep. It was held that the accused was liable under this section as the fact that the peon went to sleep did not in any way put an end to his custody, or affect the accused's duty to submit to the judgment of the law.⁴ The accused, who was arrested by a process-server, was released by a number of his friends. He made no resistance himself but disappeared and surrendered the next morning. It was held that he having taken advantage of his release and gone away when rescued by his friends, was guilty of escaping from lawful custody.⁵

The word 'escape' includes an escape effected with the consent of the custodian. Where the accused, under arrest by a process-server in execution of a decree, was set at liberty on his promise to pay the decretal amount within a given time, or, failing which, to surrender himself into custody again, and subsequently failed to carry out either of the two alternatives, it was held that he had committed an offence under this section.⁶ Where the accused escaped from the jail in which he was confined for having failed to furnish security to be of good behaviour (s. 123, Criminal Procedure Code), it was held that he had committed an offence under this section and not under s. 224.⁷ A bailiff armed with a warrant of arrest apprehended the accused in his village. The accused refused to accompany him and sat down. The trial Court convicted him under this section. It was held that the mere refusal to go with the bailiff and the sitting down did not constitute an attempt to escape.⁸ Where the accused on arrest for a decree paid detention batta for two days and refused to follow the process-server when called but entered into his vakil's house, and appeared before the Court on the third day, it was held that the accused was guilty of escaping from lawful custody.⁹

'Lawfully detained'.—A person cannot be convicted of escape or attempt to escape, unless the custody in which he was detained was lawful.¹⁰ A person about to be arrested is entitled to know under what power the constable is arresting him and, if he specifies a certain power which the person knows the constable has not got, he is entitled to object to such arrest and escape from custody, such custody not being a lawful one. The prosecution must first establish that the constable who arrested the man had power to act under the specific authority that he claimed to have.¹¹ A warrant issued by a revenue officer for the arrest of a defaulting witness, which does not contain the name of the person to be arrested, is illegal and a conviction, under this section, of the witness arrested under such warrant for escaping from custody, and of others, under s. 353 for assaulting a public servant in the discharge of his duty, is bad in law.¹² The Allahabad High Court has taken a different view on similar facts. Two constables in the bona fide execution of their duty carried out an arrest under a warrant which, unknown to them, was in fact not legally issued. Whereupon certain persons came up and rescued the prisoner and tore up the warrant but did not cause hurt to any one. It was held that the rescuers were not liable to punishment under this section or s. 323, but should have been convicted under s. 352.¹³ A civil Court is not empowered to leave a judgment-debtor in the custody of a peon after giving him time to pay up a decretal amount nor is such detention 'lawful custody' within the meaning of this section. A judgment-debtor was arrested in execution of a decree and was brought before the Court passing the decree. He applied for two days' time. The Court made him over to the custody of a peon and the judgment-debtor paid his own diet money for two days. Subsequently he escaped from the custody of the peon. It was held that he was not guilty of any offence as he was not in lawful custody.¹⁴ Where the accused was arrested in the verandah of his house after sunset in pursuance of a warrant for a civil Court decree and he escaped from arrest, it was held that the arrest was illegal as the verandah was part of a dwelling under s. 55, Civil Procedure Code, and the accused could not be arrested after sunset in a dwelling-house.¹⁵ Arrest under a civil process is not effected unless either the person to be arrested submits to the arrest or the officer making the arrest actually touches or confines the body of the person to be arrested. Where, therefore, the bailiff of a civil Court met the accused in a street, showed him his staff, and told him that he was under arrest but did not touch him, and the accused, instead of accompanying him, walked away and entered a shop, it was held that the accused could not be convicted of the offence of escaping from lawful custody of the bailiff under this section.¹⁶ A surety who had given security under O. XXXVIII, r. 1, Civil Procedure Code, applied to the Court for his discharge. The Court discharged the surety and ordered the arrest and detention of the judgment-debtor until he produced another surety. The judgment-debtor left the Court and for this he was prosecuted under this section. It was held that he was not guilty inasmuch as there was no order to find fresh security as required by the Civil Procedure Code, and the detention in the absence of such an order was illegal.¹⁷

1. 'Rescues or attempts to rescue any other person from any custody in which that person is lawfully detained'.—Where a person was rescued from the custody of a police-officer, who had arrested him at a place other than the one which was mentioned in the search-warrant, it was held that this did not amount to an offence under this section.¹⁸

A person cannot rescue himself from lawful custody and he cannot be convicted under this section.¹⁹

Detention under s. 54 of the Criminal Procedure Code.—A police-officer is empowered under s. 54 (1) (6) to arrest without a warrant a person reasonably suspected of being a deserter from the Army. Persons rescuing such a person from such custody are guilty under this section.²⁰

Village Chowkidari Act (Beng. Act VI of 1890).—Resistance to an arrest by a chowkidar is an offence.²¹

Land Revenue Act (U. P. Act III of 1901), ss. 142, 143 and 146.—Under s. 142, Land Revenue Act, all the proprietors are jointly and severally responsible to Government for the revenue and the arrears may be realized, under s. 146, by the arrest and detention of the defaulter as defined in s. 143. Hence, where a co-sharer had made default in payment of Government revenue and under a writ of detention was confined in the lock-up wherefrom he escaped, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.²²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused offered some resistance or illegal obstruction.

(2) That he did so (a) to prevent the lawful apprehension of himself or of any other person, or (b) to escape or attempt to escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained, or (c) to rescue or attempt to rescue some person from some custody in which that person was lawfully detained.

(3) That he did as in (1) intentionally.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

The correct procedure to be adopted by a civil Court desirous of prosecuting a person who has escaped from the lawful custody of a servant of the Court is that the servant of the Court should file a complaint in the ordinary way. The High Court will not interfere in revision with an order of acquittal passed by a Magistrate of competent jurisdiction, or a prosecution for an alleged offence under this section, irregularly instituted on a report sent in by a Munsif which was treated as a complaint.²³

In a prosecution under this section, the proper person to make the complaint is the officer from whom the escape or rescue has been effected. But a complaint by another person aware of the facts is not a nullity. A Magistrate is competent to make a complaint as a common informer.²⁴

226. Whoever, having been lawfully transported,¹ returns from such transportation, the term of such transportation not having expired, and his punishment not having been remitted, shall be punished with transportation for life, and shall also be liable to fine, and to be imprisoned with rigorous imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years before he is so transported.

Unlawful return from transportation.

COMMENT.

This section punishes the criminal who is lawfully transported but who unlawfully returns from the place of transportation.

1. 'Having been lawfully transported.'—A person serving out his sentence of transportation in the jail without being transported is not a person 'lawfully transported.' It is essential that the convict should have been actually sent to a penal settlement, and have returned before his term of transportation had expired or been remitted. If a prisoner escapes from custody whilst on his way to undergo sentence of transportation, he commits an offence punishable under s. 224, and not under this section.²⁵

The word 'lawfully' indicates that the Court passing the sentence must have jurisdiction to do so, and the offence must be one for which transportation is a legal punishment.

A prisoner was indicted for being found at large in England before the expiration of a term for which he had been sentenced to be transported. It was held that the fact of such sentence being in force at the time he was so found at large, was sufficiently proved by the certificate of his conviction and sentence,—the judgment remaining unreversed,—although, on the face of such certificate, it appeared that the sentence was one which could not have been inflicted on him for the offence of which he had been convicted.¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused had been lawfully transported.

(2) That the term of transportation had not expired.

(3) That the punishment of such transportation had not been remitted.

(4) That the accused had returned from such transportation.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, having been sentenced to transportation by the Court of Session of—(specify the term) and that on the—day of—, at—, you did return from such transportation, the term of such transportation not having expired, and your punishment not having been remitted, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 226 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

227. Whoever, having accepted any conditional remission of punishment, knowingly violates any condition on which such remission was granted, shall be punished with the punishment to which he was originally sentenced, if he has already suffered no part of that punishment, and if he has suffered any part of that punishment, then with so much of that punishment as he has not already suffered.

sion of punishment.

COMMENT.

This section deals with those cases in which remission of punishment is made conditional by Government under s. 401 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the nature and extent of the original punishment to which the accused had been sentenced.

(2) That such punishment had been remitted.

(3) That such remission had been granted to and accepted by the accused upon a certain condition.

(4) That the accused violated such condition.

The Court has to decide whether a conditionally released prisoner has violated the conditions on which remission was granted to him. Until he has been found guilty under this section, it is not for the jail authorities to say that he has committed an offence.²

(5) That he did so, knowing that he was violating such condition.

(6) Prove also whether the accused has already suffered any part of the original punishment.

The first three points must be proved by documentary evidence, viz. a certified copy of the judgment as regards conviction and sentence; a certified copy of the order of remission; and the bond executed by the accused. Oral evidence is inadmissible on these points. The identity of the accused and the breach of the conditions may be established by oral evidence.³

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by the Court by which the original offence was triable.

Jurisdiction.—A person convicted by the Recorder's Court of! Prince of Wales' Island, Singapore and Malacca, of the crime of burglary, and sentenced to transportation for ten years was released from the Ratnagiri Jail on a ticket-of-leave after having been in confinement for more than eight years. At Karwar he committed theft in a dwelling-house before his sentence had expired. It was held that the First Class Magistrate at Karwar had jurisdiction to try the case.⁴

That you, on or about the—day of—were sentenced in case No.—of—by the Court of—to—(mention the punishment) and which punishment was remitted on—by the order of—on your accepting the condition, to wit,—and which you accepted, and which you knowingly violated in that on or about the—day of—you—(state the nature of the violation) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 227 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge.

COMMENT.

This is the only section of the Penal Code which deals with contempts committed against a judicial officer, that is to say, a Court.

In cases coming under this section, the Court is both prosecutor and judge and so the powers should be used only in exceptional cases. Courts taking action under this section ought not to give room for the impression that they are unduly sensitive.⁵

Object.—The object of this section is to punish a person who intentionally insults in any way the Court administering justice. It is to preserve the prestige and dignity of the Court that this section is provided. It lays down the highest sentence that could be inflicted for contempt of Court. Under s. 480 of the Criminal Procedure Code a person guilty of contempt of Court may be dealt with summarily, but in such cases he can only be fined.

Scope.—This section is confined to those cases of contempt of Court where the public servant is sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding. But the Court has inherent jurisdiction to punish cases of contempt not coming within the purview of this section. A process-server was insulted in most filthy language, caught by his throat and severely pushed out of a room by the plaintiff while effecting service of a notice; service was subsequently effected by him by affixing a copy on the outer door. It was held that when a process-server, in execution of his duty, has been abused and assaulted, it is a contempt of Court, as it is an attempt to obstruct or unduly interfere with the administration of justice. Those who have duties to discharge pursuant to the orders of a Court are protected by the law and shielded on their way to the discharge of such duties, while discharging them and on their return therefrom in order that such persons may safely have resort to Courts of Justice and carry out their order.⁶

The Penal Code does not provide against a contempt of Court committed by the publication of a libel out of Court, when the Court is not sitting, and neither in Chapter XXI (of Defamation) nor elsewhere, does it provide for the punishment of a contempt of Court committed by the publication of a libel reflecting upon a Judge in his judicial capacity, or in reference to his conduct in the discharge of his public duties.⁷

“Courts of record have inherent power to punish contempts of their authority whether committed in the face of the Court or whether committed vicariously upon the persons of their officers. It was, however, not thought fit to give power of that character to subordinate courts. The express provisions of section 228 set forth the contempts of inferior courts which are punishable under the Code and it was subsequently held that contempts, which would be certainly contempts of a court of record, if they do not come within the provisions of section 228 or any other section, cannot be punished as offences of the character of contempt of court. And it was further held that the High Courts of record cannot punish contempts of the inferior courts. Subsequently the Contempt of Courts Act was passed which enabled the superior courts to punish contempts of the inferior courts notwithstanding that such contempt as is complained of is not an offence (as contempt) against any of the sections of the Indian Penal Code and the object is that as to contempts considered as contempts of the court which are punishable by the Indian Penal Code they shall not be taken cognizance of by the High Court.”⁸

Ingredients.—Three things are necessary under this section:—

1. Intention.
2. Insult or interruption to a public servant.
3. The public servant insulted or interrupted must have been sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding.

1. ‘Intentionally.’—The insult or interruption to the Court should be intentional. “Merely uttering of words and not keeping silent can hardly be construed as intentional insult or interruption caused by an undefended prisoner during the course of a judicial proceeding against him.”⁹ An audible remark which has the effect of interrupting the Court is not enough to convict the accused.¹⁰

As regards interruptions on the part of pleaders it has been said : “Some latitude should be allowed to a member of the bar, insisting in the conduct of his case upon his question being taken down or his objections noted, where the Court thinks the question inadmissible or the objections untenable. There ought to be a spirit of give and take between the Bench and the Bar in such matters and every little persistence on the part of a pleader should not be turned into an occasion for a criminal trial unless the pleader’s conduct is so clearly vexatious as to lead to the inference that his intention is to insult or interrupt the Court.”¹¹

2. ‘Offers any insult, or causes any interruption to any public servant.’—The insult should be of a public servant sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding. A coarse expression used by a litigant but not addressed to the Court can hardly be treated as an intentional insult to the Court or interruption of the proceedings under this section, even if it is actually overheard by the presiding officer.¹² But vulgar abuse addressed to the Court amounts to an offence under this section.¹³ If a remark is not addressed to a Court, however rude or vulgar it may be, it cannot be made the subject of an offence under this section, even if the Court happens to overhear it.¹⁴

Where an assessor appeared in Court dressed in a paheeran (loose shirt), a cap, and a scarf, it was held that he did not commit an offence, in the absence of any rule as to the dress of assessors, and in the absence of any suggestion that the dress offended against any rule of public decency or was intended to be insulting to the Court.¹⁵ Where K gave away in marriage a minor girl while she was in the custody of a guardian appointed by the Court, the appointment being well understood to involve the forbidding of anybody to deal with the minor by marriage or otherwise while she was under that guardianship, it was held that the conduct of K was merely a disobedience of the order of the Court and did not constitute an offence punishable under this section.¹⁶

Acts such as rude and contumacious behaviour; obstinacy, perverseness, prevarication or refusal to answer any lawful question; breach of the peace or any wilful disturbance whatever, will amount to a contempt of Court.

Refusal to answer question.—Prevarication by a witness and refusal to answer a question might amount to intentional interruption within the meaning of this section.¹⁷ The head-notes to these cases seem inaccurate. All that the decisions show is that the findings of a Magistrate did not clearly specify that there had been an interruption. In other words, it was held, not that prevarication could not constitute an interruption, but that it was not necessarily so.¹⁸

Where in an inquiry ordered by the former Chief Court of the Punjab the examination of a person as a witness was adjourned to another date and on that day he, before entering into the witness-box, presented to the Court an application praying that, for the reasons mentioned therein, the inquiry might be stopped and after his application was rejected he refused to answer the questions put to him by counsel in the case on the ground that his application ought to have been granted, it was held that the persistent refusal to answer any question whatsoever amounted to an intentional interruption within the meaning of this section.¹⁹

3. ‘While such public servant is sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding.’—Insult or interruption to a public servant, offered under this section, should be while he is sitting in a stage of a judicial proceeding. A judicial proceeding is not necessarily at an end when the sentence is passed. The section does not provide against a contempt of Court committed by the publication of a libel out of Court, when the Court is not sitting.²⁰ The whole sitting of a Court for the disposal of judicial work from the opening to the rising of the Court is a judicial proceeding, and the necessary interval between the conclusion of one case and the opening of another is a stage in a judicial proceeding. In proceedings against the accused under s. 107, Criminal Procedure Code, the Magistrate recorded and read out an order calling upon him to give security, whereupon the accused used certain words to the effect that the Court had to act with zulm (oppression) and mockingly asked whether this zulm was to be applied to Mahomedans as well as to Hindus. The Magistrate convicted him under this section. On appeal, the Sessions Judge set aside the conviction on the ground that proceedings under s. 107 having been concluded by the reading out of the final order, the Court had not been insulted during any stage of a judicial proceeding. The former Chief Court of the Punjab reversed the order of the Sessions Judge holding that the announcement of the order under s. 107 was undoubtedly a stage in a judicial proceeding, and these proceedings must be held to have continued until the accused was allowed to leave the Court after executing the bond required by the Court, or was removed in custody on failing to execute it. A Magistrate cannot be considered to have concluded a case the very moment he has announced his order, while his judgment is still in his hands and before he could possibly have turned to any other occupation.²¹

‘Judicial proceeding.’—See Comment on s. 192 as to the meaning of this expression. This expression includes any proceedings under the Registration Act, XVI of 1908. A Sub-Registrar is a public officer, and proceedings before him are judicial proceedings within the meaning of this section.²² So are proceedings before an Income-tax Officer pursuant to a notice under s. 23(3);²³ or the Debt Settlement Boards created under the Bengal Agricultural Debtors Act, 1935.²⁴

While a Tahsildar was engaged in hearing a civil case, he allowed the proceedings to be interrupted by the accused who had brought part of a sum due from him for revenue, and promised the balance on a later date. On the Tahsildar pressing for immediate payment in full, the accused was alleged to have abused him. It was held that the Tahsildar was not sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding and therefore the accused could not be convicted under this section.²⁵

Contempt.—A person bidding for an estate at a sale in execution with the knowledge that he was not in a position to deposit the earnest-money;¹ a person persisting in putting irrelevant and vexatious questions to a witness after warning;² an accused person making an impertinent threat to a witness in the box;³ a person sentenced to two hours’ imprisonment and ordered to be kept in custody insulting the Magistrate in the grossest manner;⁴ a person chewing betel while being examined as a witness;⁵ an accused calling the trial Judge a ‘prejudiced Judge’;⁶ a person stating in an application for postponement to enable him to make an application for transfer of a suit that the Court had become hostile to him;⁷ a counsel saying to a full bench of the Court that his client does not wish the matter to be argued before the bench as constituted,⁸ were held guilty of contempt of Court.

Matter published in a newspaper relating to the past life of an accused or to his antecedent character, particularly if it suggests an offence similar to that with which he is charged, is contempt of Court as it must tend to interfere with the fair trial of that charge.⁹

No contempt.—A person retracting statements in giving evidence;¹⁰ a person

leaving the Court when ordered to remain;¹¹ or making signs from outside to a prisoner on his trial;¹² a person listening to evidence after being told to leave the Court;¹³ a person absenting himself from the Court in disobedience to a summons;¹⁴ a person using vulgar language for the purpose of emphasis;¹⁵ a person walking out of the Court without answering the question whether he had any witness;¹⁶ a person reluctantly speaking the truth, or giving inconsistent answers;¹⁷ a person refusing to give direct answers to questions;¹⁸ a person walking with creaking shoes near a Court room;¹⁹ a person presenting an application for transfer of a case containing allegations that the persons who caused the proceeding to be instituted were on terms of intimacy with the Magistrate;²⁰ a person making an application for transfer of a case containing assertions of a scandalous or defamatory nature concerning the Magistrate who was trying the case;²¹ a person writing a letter to the Judge containing an imputation that he acted unlawfully and with a view to cause him loss,²² were held to have committed no offence under this section. A Magistrate in his order adjourning a case made a remark that unnecessary questions had been put by the pleader for the accused. To this remark the pleader took exception saying that he resented it. The Magistrate asked the pleader to reduce his protest to writing which the pleader considered unnecessary and observed that the Magistrate's remark was improper. The Magistrate after demanding an apology which was refused ordered the detention in custody of the pleader. At that stage a friend of the pleader sought to enter the Court room but was pushed out in a rough manner by a chaprasi. The pleader thereupon protested against the treatment meted out to his friend. The Magistrate took this as an interruption in his work and refused to listen. The pleader remarked that this was strange. At the end of the day's proceedings the Magistrate took action against the pleader under this section. It was held that the pleader had not offended against any of the rules of conduct laid down for the profession of law and that the expressions used by him did not amount to any breach of such principles as to call for any action under this section.²³

The use of objectionable or defamatory expressions in the petition presented to a Magistrate could not be regarded as a contempt committed in his presence justifying him in taking immediate action under this section and s. 480, Criminal Procedure Code.²⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person offended is a public servant.

(2) That, at the time of the offence, such public servant was sitting in some stage of a judicial proceeding.²⁵

(3) That whilst he was so sitting, the accused offered an insult to such public servant, or caused some interruption to him.

(4) That he did so intentionally.

Intention must be strictly made out by the prosecution.¹

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by the Court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of Chapter XXXV of the Criminal Procedure Code. See s. 480, Criminal Procedure Code.

The law requires that a criminal Court inflicting a fine for contempt of Court should specially record its reasons, the facts constituting the contempt with any statement the offender may make as well as the finding and sentence.² The record must show the nature and stage of the judicial proceedings in which the Court interrupted or insulted was sitting and the nature of the interruption or insult.³ Omission to set forth the particulars required by s. 481, cl. (2), of the Criminal Procedure Code, would be fatal to the proceedings.⁴

Proper opportunity should be given to the accused to meet the charge.⁵

The procedure laid down in s. 480, Criminal Procedure Code, should be strictly followed. The provisions of the section should be applied then and there, at any rate before its rising, by the Court in whose view or presence a contempt has been committed.⁶ The Bombay High Court has held that it is not permissible to the Court to hear evidence and postpone sentence until a later date.⁷ The Allahabad High Court has held that the Magistrate may postpone passing sentence until some subsequent day if the accused is not thereby prejudiced.⁸

A charge under this section should be dealt with in a summary manner under s. 480 or else in a rather more elaborate manner provided by s. 482.⁹ The Court has the option of proceeding either under ss. 480 to 482, or under s. 476, and the existence of s. 482 does not operate so as to take away this option.¹⁰

Complaint.—A complaint in writing of the Court before which the offence is committed, or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is required.¹¹

Personation of a juror or assessor.

empanelled or sworn as a jurymen or assessor in any case in which he knows that he is not entitled by law² to be so returned, empanelled or sworn, or knowing himself to have been so returned, empanelled or sworn contrary to law, shall voluntarily³ serve on such jury or as such assessor, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section is intended to punish false personation of a juror or an assessor. It deals with two classes of cases : (1) where the accused had guilty knowledge before he was returned, i.e., got himself enlisted as a juror or assessor, and (2) where he had such knowledge after he was returned.

Six sections of the Code deal with false personation, viz. ss. 140, 170, 171, 171F, 205 and 229.

1. 'By personation or otherwise, shall intentionally cause, or knowingly suffer himself to be returned.'—'To be returned' means getting oneself enlisted as a juror or as an assessor.

It is a misdemeanour at common law for a person to pretend to be a qualified jurymen, and to go into the jury-box and act in the name of a qualified jurymen, and this without any corrupt motive on the part of such person.¹²

2. 'Not entitled by law.'—See s. 278, Criminal Procedure Code, which says what persons are not qualified to serve as jurors or assessors. As to choosing of a jury, see s. 276, Criminal Procedure Code; as to choosing of assessors, see s. 321, Criminal Procedure Code.

3. 'Voluntarily.'—See s. 39, supra.

PRACTICE.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO COIN AND GOVERNMENT STAMPS.

ON second conviction of an offence under this Chapter punishable with imprisonment for three years, the offender may be punished with transportation for life or ten years' imprisonment (vide s. 75).

COMMENT.

Why heavier punishment for counterfeiting the King's coin.—The authors of the Code say : "We have proposed that the Government of India should follow the general practice of Government in punishing more severely the counterfeiting of its own coin than the counterfeiting of foreign coin. It appears to us peculiarly advisable, under the present circumstances of India, to make this distinction. It is much to be wished that the Company's currency may supersede the numerous coinages which are issued from a crowd of mints in the dominions of the petty Princes of India. It has appeared to us that this object may be in some degree promoted by the law as we have framed it. That coinage, the purity of which is guarded by the most rigorous penalties, is likely to be the most pure; and that coinage which is likely to be the most pure will be the most readily taken in the course of business.

"It is not very probable that any person in this country will employ himself in making counterfeit sovereigns or shillings; but should so improbable an event occur, we think that the King's coin should have the same protection which is given to the coin of the local Government...It appears to us, however, that the offence of coining, though, in an arbitrary classification, it may be called by the technical name of treason, is in substance an offence against property and trade, that it is an offence of very nearly the same kind with the forging of a banknote, and that it would be an offence of exactly the same kind if the banknote, like the notes of the Bank of England formerly, were in all cases legal tender, or if the coin, like the Company's gold mohur at present, were not legal tender. We do not therefore conceive that in proposing a law for punishing the counterfeiting of the King's coin, we are proposing a law which can reasonably be said to affect any of the royal prerogatives."¹

1. 'Coin.'—The present definition of 'coin' was introduced by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (XIX of 1872) in order to check the practice of counterfeiting the copper coin of Indian States. The former definition defined coin as "metal stamped and issued by the authority of some Government." But 'Government', by s. 17, denotes the person or persons authorized by law to administer executive Government in any part of British India. It had thus happened that the coin of Indian States was not coin within the meaning of the Code.

The Indian Coinage Act (III of 1906) deals with coins of different denominations and their weight, dimensions and designs.

2. 'For the time being.'—These words were introduced by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (XIX of 1872) as it was suggested that the definition might possibly be held to include old coin, such as a Græco-Bactrian States formerly used as money, but now regarded only as a curiosity. A coin of the time of Emperor Akbar² or a gold mohur of the reign of Shahjahan³ cannot be deemed to be a coin inasmuch as it is not used for the time being as money.

Legal tender not necessary.—Coin need not be a legal tender receivable at a value in rupees fixed by law. Gold mohurs which although they do not pass at an absolutely fixed value, yet have a current value, not ascertainable merely by weighing them as lumps of gold, but attaching to them as coin, are coins "for the time being used as money."⁴

The test of whether a particular piece of metal is money or not (supposing it genuine) is the possibility of taking it into the market, and obtaining goods of any kind in exchange for it. For this, its value must be ascertained and notorious; that it is known to persons of special skill or information is not sufficient.⁵

3. 'Queen's coin.'—The present definition of Queen's coin was introduced by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (VI of 1896), s. 1. The reasons for amending the definition are stated as follows: "At present 'coin' is defined as metal used for the time being as money, and the consequence is that, if any offence under these sections has to be proved, it has to be shown that the coin was in use at the time of the offence as money. There is a process in coinage which is provided for by law, namely, in the Indian Coinage Act, which is termed 'the calling in of coin'. This gives Government an authority which it exercises under certain circumstances to call in coin and to cause it after a certain time to cease to be used as money. It is extremely doubtful whether if the coin so called in has been counterfeited, a Court would hold that it was in use as money after the date of the proclamation which had called it in. After a certain time it would certainly cease to be in use as money. This power to call in money has been exercised in one case,—and I think in only one,—namely, that of the Farukhabad rupee, which immediately preceded the existing Government rupee, or, as it was at first called, 'the Company's rupee.' It was called in in 1877. We have ascertained that this coin has been recently largely manufactured in Bombay. The manufacture has been carried on perfectly openly, and it has been brought to our notice by some of our Political Officers who showed that it was being imported into Central India and Rajputana in considerable quantities. This manufacture we are unable, under the present law, to stop, because that particular coin is not in use at present as money. The immediate practical object of the change which I propose to the Council to make in the Indian Penal Code is to put a stop to this particular coinage. But it is obvious that the same necessity may arise in any future case. We may at any time find reason to call in any particular issues of the rupee, and it would be an extremely peculiar state of the law if an act which is to-day reckoned so harmful as to be punishable with ten years' imprisonment should tomorrow become a perfectly innocent one. It is to protect our action against a consequence of this kind that the measure is proposed.

"But there is a special necessity peculiar to India which arises in this connection. In a great part of the Native State of India coin is not current in the same legal sense in which it is current in British India; that is to say, there is no law of legal tender; and the consequence is that many kinds of coins pass in those Native States from hand to hand, not by reason of being legal tender, but by reason of each person who receives them knowing that they are customarily current in his own or other Native States, and that any other person will receive them in the same way as he receives them. From the fact that these Farukhabad rupees were imported in such large quantities into Rajputana and Central India, there can be little doubt that they are current in this sense in certain part of Rajputana and Central India. . . It seems to me, therefore, . . . that we are under some obligation to the Native States in this matter not to permit a coin which passes, or which certainly might pass, there from hand to hand as an ordinary circulating coin, to be fabricated by private individuals in British India."⁶

Illustration (e).—This illustration was added by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (VI of 1896), s. 1 (2). It has been held that Murshidabad rupees stand on the same footing as Farukhabad rupees.⁷

Amendment.—The word 'Central' was added before 'Government' and the words 'of India' were omitted after the word 'Government' by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order 1937. In Burma the word "Burma" was substituted for the words "any Presidency", by the Government of Burma (Adaptation of Laws) Order, 1937.

231. Whoever counterfeits¹ or knowingly performs any part of the process² of counterfeiting coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Counterfeiting coin.

Explanation.—A person commits this offence who intending to practise deception, or knowing it to be likely that deception will thereby be practised, causes a genuine coin to appear like a different coin.

COMMENT.

It is not necessary under this section that the counterfeit coin should be made with the primary intention of its being passed as genuine; it is sufficient if the resemblance to genuine coin is so close that it is capable of being passed as such.⁸

1. 'Counterfeits.'—A "counterfeit coin" means a coin not genuine, but resembling, or apparently intended to resemble, or pass for genuine coin; and includes genuine coin prepared or altered so as to resemble or pass for coin of a higher denomination.⁹ As to the definition of the word 'counterfeit', see s. 28, supra.

The thing charged to be counterfeit coin must have some such resemblance to a genuine piece of coin as to show that it was intended to resemble and pass for it, though the imitation may be imperfect or the process incomplete.¹⁰ A counterfeiting, with some small variation in the inscription, effigies, or arms, done with the intention of evading the law, is yet within it.¹¹ It is not necessary to have impression of any sort on a counterfeit coin if it was meant to pass off as a worn out or defaced coin of a particular denomination.¹² Preparing blanks with such material as when rubbed will make them resemble the real coin amounts to a complete offence.¹³ It is not also necessary that the counterfeit coin should be counterfeit of the current coin.¹⁴

2. 'Performs any part of the process.'—The offence is complete although the coin may not be in a fit state to be uttered, or the work may not be finished or perfected. The section applies equally whether the act of counterfeiting is complete or unfinished.

Coin should be of a kind for the time being used as money.—Where a person counterfeited a coin of the Emperor Akbar's time, it was held that he had committed no offence under this section.¹⁵ A person counterfeiting Kuldar and Jeypur gold-mohurs was held to be guilty under this section because although they did not pass at a fixed value yet they had a current value attached to them as coin.¹⁶ Certain Nepalese came to the shop of the accused who at their request agreed to make for them in German silver a number of imitations of a current Nepalese coin. The coins were not intended originally to be passed as genuine coins, for it was stipulated that they should be made with hooks attached to them; but in fact this was not done and the coins were handed over plain. It was held that he was guilty under this section.¹⁷ Certain merchants had been in the habit of sending copper to the Nawab of Lohareo, who turned the metal, in a mint established for the purpose, into small round pieces upon which a certain stamp was impressed, the stamp not purporting to resemble the mark on any legal coin. These pieces of copper were then sold in the bazaars in British India by weight, and used as money. It was generally believed that the Nawab had authority to establish the mints and issue this copper as coin. It was held that the pieces of copper were not counterfeit coin.¹⁸

Where the impression of money was forged on an irregular piece of metal, not rounded, without finishing it, so as not to be in a state to pass current, the offence was held to be incomplete, although the accused had actually attempted to pass it in that condition.¹⁹ Where a genuine sovereign had been fraudulently filed at the edges to such an extent as to reduce the weight by one-twenty-fourth part, and to remove the milling entirely, or almost entirely, and a new milling had been added in order to restore the appearance of the coin, it was held that the coin was false and counterfeit.²⁰

Passing medal.—Where a person fraudulently represented to an ignorant person a medal as being money, it was held that he had committed no offence.²¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the metal is a coin.

(2) That the accused counterfeited it, or performed on it any part of the process of counterfeiting.

(3) That he did so knowingly.

To prove the offence of counterfeiting, it is not necessary to show that the accused person was detected in the act. But presumptive evidence will be sufficient where a false coin is found in his possession, and coining tools are discovered in his house, etc.

Where the accused is charged with 'performing any part of the process of counterfeiting' it will not be sufficient merely to show that steps have been taken towards counterfeiting as by providing materials, tools, etc., but some stage of the process itself must be proved to have been commenced.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Bombay Circular.—Evidence of Mint Officer.—When the evidence of an officer connected with the Mint or the Currency Department is required as to the genuineness or spuriousness of a coin or currency note, the Courts and Magistrates are recommended to send the coin or note to the Mint Master, or to the Commissioner of Paper Currency, Bombay, as the case may be, under cover of their Court seal or by messenger whose evidence can afterwards be taken and, at the same time, to issue a commission for the examination of such officer as a witness under the provisions of s. 503 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This will prevent the great inconvenience of officers being called away from their duties on mere ordinary occasions. In special cases

Burma circular.—The Government of India have drawn attention to the inadequacy of the sentences which in some instances are passed by the Courts for offences relating to the coinage. Magistrates are therefore reminded of the necessity for the imposition of suitable sentences in such cases. Sessions Judges and District Magistrates are also requested to scrutinize carefully all sentences passed in such cases. In any instance in which the sentence of the Court is obviously insufficient, application should be made to the High Court to revise and enhance the sentence.²³

That you, on or about the—day of—at—, counterfeited (or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting, to wit—), a coin (or King's coin), to wit—and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 231 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

232. Whoever counterfeits¹ or knowingly performs any part of the process² of countefeiting the Queen's coin,³ shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Counterfeiting
Queen's coin.

COMMENT.

This section enables the Court to inflict enhanced sentence where the offence committed is the same as in the last section but the coin is King's coin.

To constitute the offence described in this section, there must be an intention that the coins made will be used as King's coin or a knowledge that they are likely to be used as such. Such knowledge or intention will be inferred from the mere fact of counterfeiting, except under circumstances which conclusively negative it; but a distinction must be drawn between a deception practised for show merely, and one practised for wrongful loss or gain, and the former is not an offence under the Penal Code.²⁴ If the intention of the person who makes coins resembling genuine coins is to foist a false case upon his enemy by introducing the coins into his house and not to put the coins in circulation, no offence is committed under this section.²⁵

1. 'Counterfeits.'—See s. 28, supra.

2. 'Performs any part of the process.'—See s. 231, supra.

3. 'Queen's coin.'—See s. 230, supra.

Circulation of spurious coin not necessary.—In order to constitute offences under this section and s. 235, it is not necessary to prove that the accused intended that the spurious coins should go into circulation and be used as money. It is sufficient that there should be the intention to practise deception by means of the imitation.¹ But where false coins are made only for the purpose of passing them secretly into the house of the coiner's enemy in order to get him into trouble, the persons making those coins and in possession of the instruments and materials used therefor are neither guilty under this section nor under s. 235, but are liable to be convicted only under s. 195.² person to get it changed for other coins as a rupee, it was held that he would not be guilty of an offence under this section, unless at the time of quick-silvering the coin he intended thereby to practise deception, or knew it to be likely that deception would thereby be practised.³ Explanation 2 to s. 28 added by the Metal Tokens Act I of 1889 shakes the principle of this case. PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 231, showing in (1) that the coin counterfeited is a King's coin.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Sections 232 and 235.—The accused was convicted of, and sentenced for, an offence under s. 232, i.e., for performing a part in the process of counterfeiting King's coin, and on a second count under s. 235, for having in his possession implements and materials for the purpose of using the same for counterfeiting King's coin. It was held that the possession of such instruments and materials being part and parcel of the transaction of counterfeiting coin the sentence for the second offence was illegal.⁶

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, did counterfeit a piece of the King-Emperor's coin, to wit——, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 232 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

COMMENT.

In this as well as in the following section mere acts of preparation towards the commission of the offence of coining are made substantive offences, such as the making of dies or other instruments used in the manufacture of coin.

1. 'Performs any part of the process.'—It is not necessary that the instrument should be capable of making an entire impression of a coin.⁷

In the case of a previous conviction the accused should be committed for trial to the Court of Session, unless the Magistrate is competent to try the case and is of opinion that he can himself pass an adequate sentence if the accused is convicted.⁸

Charge.—Same as that for s. 234.

COMMENT.

This section describes the same offence as in the last, but provides enhanced punishment as the coin affected is the King's coin.

CASES.

Intention necessary.—The accused employed a die-sinker to make for a pretended innocent purpose a die calculated to make shillings; the die-sinker, suspecting fraud, informed the Commissioners of the mint, and under their directions made the die for the purpose of detecting the accused. It was held that the die-sinker was an innocent agent, and the accused was the real offender.⁹ The accused ordered dies, impressed with the resemblance of the sides of a sovereign, of the maker. The maker gave information to the police, who communicated with the authorities of the mint. The latter authorities, through the police, gave the maker permission to give them to the accused. He did so, and they were found in the accused's possession. It was held that the accused being knowingly in possession of the dies, had a sufficient guilty knowledge to constitute felony, whatever his intention as to their use might be.¹⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 233, showing in (1) that the coin counterfeited is a King's coin.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

COMMENT.

This section punishes the person who is in possession of any instrument or material for the purpose of using the same for counterfeiting coins.

1. 'Possession of any instrument or material.'—The word 'possession' connotes the intention to exercise power or control over the object possessed (animus sibi habendi) and therefore necessarily implies that the possessor has been conscious of the possibility of exercising that power or control. The mere physical relation arising from the position of the object is insufficient. The possession contemplated is not possession which has never been voluntary: and for the purpose of bringing home to any person the voluntary possession of any object, the mere proof of a fact of which he knows nothing, would be valueless. The section no doubt also requires in the accused person intention or knowledge as to the use to be made of the objects in possession, and these might be implied from the nature of the objects themselves. But before that stage is reached, there must be some circumstance indicating such intention or knowledge as is inseparable from the notion of conscious retention implied in the word 'possession'. "Such indication may arise from the position of the object in a place which is constantly used by the person accused, and which could not be overlooked by him, or from the bulk of the object itself, or from any circumstance, such as the locking up of the object which would point to voluntary and conscious possession."¹¹

Under the English statute dealing with offences relating to coin the word 'possession' embraces a wider area. Having any matter in the custody or possession of any person includes "not only the having of it by himself in his personal custody or possession, but also the knowingly and wilfully having it in the actual custody or possession of any other person, and also the knowingly and wilfully having it in any dwelling house or other building, lodging, apartment, field, or other place, open or inclosed, whether belonging to or occupied by himself or not, and whether such matter shall be so had for his own use or benefit or for that of any other person."¹²

If coining implements are found in a house occupied at the time by a man and his wife, the presumption is that they are in the possession of the husband alone, unless there are circumstances to show that the wife was acting separately and without her husband's sanction, they cannot both be convicted. The fact of a wife attempting to break up coining implements at the time of her husband's apprehension if done with the object of screening him, is no evidence of possession.¹³ Where it is sought to make a wife liable along with her husband with whom she is living, it is necessary to prove that possession and control over the instruments and materials for counterfeiting were with her alone or with her also. The mere fact that the wife knew that certain implements and materials were in the possession of her husband and also the place where those implements and materials were to be found, does not necessarily indicate that be legislating instead of administering the law, with inconvenient consequences such as shifting the burden of proof indicated by sections 114 and 106 of the Evidence Act.... and even altering the substantive criminal law".

she herself was in subordinate possession or in any kind of possession of them.¹⁴ Where several persons are found in a room where false coining is going on and most of them are shown to have taken active part therein, they are all to be presumed to have been in possession of all the instruments and materials lying there which can be used for the purpose of making false coins.¹⁵

Where father and son were accused of being in possession of moulds for the purpose of using the same for making counterfeit coins and of being in possession of such coins, and there was evidence to show that the father looked after the family cultivation while the son exclusively attended to the shop, in the verandah of which the moulds and coins were discovered, and it was also shown that the father was never seen in possession of the moulds or of the counterfeit coins, it was held that the ordinary presumption that the things in the house of a joint Hindu family were in the possession, and under the control, of the managing member, had been rebutted.¹⁶

It is not only necessary that the accused should be in possession of the instruments or materials for counterfeiting coin, but it should also be proved that the possession was within the accused's knowledge.¹⁷

The accused was in possession of a box containing instruments used for counterfeiting coin. It appeared that two other brothers of his had access to the box and it was not proved that there was any property of the accused in it. It was held that the accused could not be convicted, for it was not shown that he was in exclusive possession of the box.¹⁸ The accused went into a village and purchased sweetmeats from one K, for which he paid a counterfeit two-anna piece; he also delivered another counterfeit two-anna piece to R in payment for some milk. K, on discovering the fraud, pursued the accused and aided by two others arrested him. On being pursued the accused threw away a yellow bag which was found to contain a mould, an instrument called a "gugi" used for keeping up a draught in a fire, a file and some white metal, all evidently instruments or materials used for counterfeiting coin. It was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁹

Where coining instruments were found in a house occupied by a man, his wife, and a child ten years of age, the jury were directed to acquit the child of a felonious possession.²⁰ The accused was indicted for knowingly and without lawful excuse having in his custody and possession a mould on which was impressed the figure and apparent resemblance of the obverse side of a half-crown. The mould was found in the house of the accused, who had previously passed a bad half-crown; but there was no evidence to show that the half-crown had been made in that mould. It was held that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury.²¹

Instruments of coining.—The following are held to be instruments of coining : a press for coinage;²² a mould on which was impressed the resemblance of a shilling inverted;²³ a puncheon of iron upon which was impressed the figure and similitude of the head-side of a shilling;²⁴ a collar of iron for graining the edges of counterfeit money;²⁵ and a galvanic battery.¹

2. 'For the purpose of using the same for counterfeiting coin.'—The mere possession of instruments and materials capable of counterfeiting coins is no offence. Possession of such instruments should be with the intention of counterfeiting coins, and the intention must be proved in order to establish the charge. The accused had in his possession three 'dies' and some instruments for the purpose of counterfeiting coin. He was a goldsmith by occupation, and the instruments found with him were required for his work as a goldsmith. The dies were deficient and no complete counterfeit coin could be struck from them either singly or combined. There was no evidence that he ever used those instruments or dies for the purpose of counterfeiting.

3. 'Reason to believe.'—See s. 26, supra. 4. 'Queen's coin.'—See s. 230, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the instrument or material in question is one for the purpose of counterfeiting coin (or King's coin).

It must be shown by the prosecution that the instrument is capable of counterfeiting coin.⁴

(2) That the accused was in possession of such instrument or material in question.

(3) That he was in possession thereof for the purpose of using it; or that he knew or had reason to believe that it was intended to be used for that purpose.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, if the offence relates to King's coin; otherwise by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

In the case of a previous conviction the accused should be committed for trial to the Court of Session.⁵

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, were in possession of a certain instrument (or material), to wit——, for the purpose of using the said instrument for counterfeiting a piece of King-Emperor's coin known as——[or knowing or having reason to believe that the said instrument was intended to be used for the purpose of counterfeiting, etc.], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 235 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Sentence.—Having regard to s. 71 of the Code separate sentences cannot be passed under . 232 and this section.

The offence of counterfeiting coin is very serious and an exemplary sentence should be given. But when a man is being convicted for being in possession of instruments or materials for counterfeiting coin it is hardly right to convict him separately for being in possession of various parts of such instruments, or materials.⁶

236. Whoever, being within British India, abets¹ the counterfeiting² of coin out of British India shall be punished in the same manner as if he abetted the counterfeiting of such coin within British India.

Abetting in India the counterfeiting out of India of coin.

COMMENT.

Any person in India, whether a British subject or a foreigner, who supplies instruments or materials for the purpose of counterfeiting any coin, or assists in any other way, is punishable under this section. Abetment in British India must be complete.

1. 'Abets.'—See s. 107, supra. 2. 'Counterfeiting.'—See s. 28, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused abetted the counterfeiting of coin.

(2) That the counterfeiting of coin was to be out of British India.

(3) That the accused was in British India at the time of such abetment.

Import of export of counterfeit coin.

COMMENT.

The offence under this and the following section consists in an import or export, whether by sea or by land, of any coin known by the importer, or which he has reason to believe, to be counterfeit.

2. 'Counterfeit.'—See s. 28, supra. 3. 'Reason to believe.'—See s. 26, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the coins in question are counterfeit coins.

(2) That the accused imported into, or exported from, British India, such coins.

(3) That he, at the time he so imported or exported them, knew, or had reason to believe, that they were counterfeit.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, did import into (or export from) British India, viz., at——, certain pieces of counterfeit coin, to wit——(specify the amount and name of the coins) knowing (or having reason to believe) that the said coins were counterfeit; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 237 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by the Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

238. Whoever imports into British India, or exports therefrom, any counterfeit coin which he knows or has reason to believe to be a counterfeit of the Queen's coin, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Import or export of counterfeits of the Queen's coin.

COMMENT.

This section describes the same offence as the one under the preceding section, but provides enhanced punishment as the coin is King's coin.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 237, showing in (1) that the counterfeit coins are King's coins.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, did import into (or export from) British India, viz., at——, certain pieces of counterfeit King-Emperor's coin, to wit——, (specify the amount and name of the coins) knowing (or having reason to believe) that the said coins were counterfeit; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 238 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

239. Whoever, having any counterfeit¹ coin, which at the time when he became possessed² of it he knew to be counterfeit,³ fraudulently⁴ or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers the same to any person, or attempts to induce any person to receive it, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Delivery of coin, possessed with knowledge that it is counterfeit.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section is directed against a person other than the coiner, who procures or obtains or receives counterfeit coin, and not to the offence committed by the coiner.⁷ The receipt of the false coin, knowing at the time it is received that it is counterfeit, is made the test of a person being such a dealer. The offence contemplated in this section appears to be a delivery or an attempt to deliver by such a dealer to some person whether an accomplice or not; the intention being that that person or some other should be defrauded.

The authors of the Code say: "An utterer by profession, an utterer who is the agent employed by the coiner to bring counterfeit coin into circulation, is guilty of a very high offence. Such an utterer stands to the coiner in a relation not very different from that in which a habitual receiver of stolen goods stands to a thief. He makes coining a far less perilous and a far more lucrative pursuit than it would otherwise be. He passes his life in the systematic violation of the law, and in the systematic practice of fraud in one of its most pernicious forms. He is one of the most mischievous, and is likely to be one of the most depraved of criminals. But a casual utterer, an utterer who is not an agent for bringing counterfeit coin into circulation, but who, having heedlessly received a bad rupee in the course of his business, takes advantage of the heedlessness of the next person with whom he deals to pay that bad rupee away, is an offender of a very different class. He is undoubtedly guilty of a dishonest act, but of one of the most venial of dishonest acts. It is an act which proceeds not from greediness for unlawful gain, but from a wish to avoid, by unlawful means it is true, what to a poor man may be a severe loss. It is an act which has no tendency to facilitate or encourage the operations of the coiner. It is an occasional act, an act which does not imply that the person who commits it is a person of lawless habits. We think, therefore, that the offence of a casual utterer is perhaps the least heinous of all the offences into which fraud enters.

"We considered whether it would be advisable to make it an offence in a person to have in his possession at one time a certain number of counterfeit coins, without being able to explain satisfactorily how he came by them. It did not, after much discussion, appear to us advisable to recommend this or any similar provision. We entertained strong objections to the practice of making circumstances which are in truth only evidence of an offence part of the definition of an offence; nor do we see any reason for departing in this case from our general rule.

"Whether a person who is possessed of bad money knows the money to be bad, and whether, knowing it to be bad, he intends to put in circulation, are questions to be decided by the tribunals according to the circumstances of the case, circumstances of which the mere number of the pieces is only one and may be one of the least important. A few bad rupees which should evidently be fresh from the stamp would be stronger evidence than a greater number of bad rupees which appeared to have been in circulation for years. A few bad rupees, all obviously coined with the same die, would be stronger evidence than a greater number obviously coined with different dies. A few bad rupees placed by themselves, and unmixed with good ones, would be far stronger evidence than a much larger number which might be detected in a large mass of treasure."⁸

Three classes of offences are created by ss. 239 to 243.

(1) Delivery to another of coin, possessed with knowledge that it is counterfeit (ss. 239, 240).

(2) Delivery to another of coin as genuine, which, when first possessed, the deliverer did not know it to be counterfeit (s. 241).

(3) Possession of counterfeit coin by a person who knew it to be counterfeit when he became possessed thereof (ss. 242, 243).

1. 'Counterfeit.'—See s. 28, supra. It is not necessary that the counterfeit coin should be a counterfeit of a current coin.⁹ But it must be a counterfeit of a coin used for the time being as money. Otherwise the offence will be that of cheating and not of uttering false coin.¹⁰

2. 'Possessed.'—See s. 235, supra.

3. 'Which, at the time when he became possessed of it, he knew to be counterfeit.'—These words point to a person other than the coiner, that is, the person who procures, or obtains, or receives counterfeit coins.¹¹ Against such a person this and the following sections are directed.

All that is required is a guilty knowledge of the spuriousness of the coin at the time of receiving possession of it.¹² A knowledge of the coin being counterfeit at the time of becoming possessed of it was inferred from the fact of the accused being goldsmiths.¹³

4. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra.

Uttering under this section must be with intent to defraud the party receiving the money. The giving of a piece of counterfeit money in charity is held to be not an uttering, although the person may know it to be counterfeit.¹⁴ But this decision has not only been questioned in a later case where a person who gave a counterfeit coin to a woman with whom he had intercourse was held to be guilty of uttering,¹⁵ but it is considered to have been overruled.¹⁶

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the coin in question is a counterfeit coin.

(2) That the accused became possessed of it.

(3) That when he became so possessed he knew that it was a counterfeit coin.¹⁷

(4) That he delivered it to some one, or attempted to induce some one to receive it.

(5) That he, when he so delivered it, etc., intended to defraud, or intended that a fraud might be committed.

Evidence of possession and the attempted disposal of coins of unusual kind is relevant on a charge of uttering such coins soon afterwards when the factum of uttering is denied.¹⁸ Possession of bad money five days after uttering a bad coin is admissible to show guilty knowledge.¹⁹ Upon an indictment for uttering a forged bill, the previous uttering by the accused of other bills forged in other names may be given in evidence in proof of guilty knowledge. It is impossible to lay down any general rule as to the time within which such previous uttering must have taken place in order to be admissible in evidence.²⁰

Upon a charge of uttering counterfeit coin, in order to prove a guilty knowledge, evidence is admissible of the subsequent uttering by the accused of counterfeit coin of a different denomination.²¹

Section 14, ill. (b), of the Indian Evidence Act, recognizes this principle of English cases.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—Same as that for s. 240.

Punishment.—Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

240. Whoever, having any counterfeit coin, which is a counterfeit of the Queen's coin, and which, at the time when he became possessed of it, he knew to be a counterfeit of the Queen's coin, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers the same to any person, or attempts to induce any person to receive it, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Delivery of Queen's coin, possessed with knowledge that it is counterfeit.

COMMENT.

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence described in the last. This section does not apply to the actual coiner.²² The offence under it is committed even though the coin is refused by the person to whom it is offered.²³

See Comment on s. 23, supra

CASES.

Sections 240 and 243.—A person having four counterfeit rupees in his possession, but uttering only one of them, cannot be separately convicted under s. 240 respecting the one rupee, and under s. 243 regarding the other three; because an offence under this section implies prior guilty possession.²⁴

Delivering.—The accused went into the shop of D, and asked to purchase some coffee and sugar, and in payment of the same he put down on D's shop a counterfeit shilling, which D took up and said to the accused that it was a bad one. The accused left D's shop, leaving the shilling; but without the coffee and sugar. It was held that he was guilty of uttering a false coin.²⁵

Ring the changes.—R bargained with the accused, a fruiterer, to have five apricots for six pence, and gave him a good shilling to change. The accused put the shilling into his mouth as if to bite it in order to try its goodness, and returning a shilling to R told him it was a bad one. R gave him another good shilling, which also he affected to bite, and then returned another shilling saying it was not a good one. Again R gave him a third good shilling with which he practised this trick a third time. The shillings returned by the accused were all bad shillings. It was held that he was guilty of uttering bad coin.¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 239, showing in (1) that the counterfeit coin is a counterfeit of the King's coin.

Joint uttering.—If two accused are indicted for uttering a counterfeit shilling, having another counterfeit shilling in their possession, it is not necessary to prove with certainly which of the pieces was the one uttered, and which was found on them unuttered, if both the pieces of money are proved to be counterfeit; and if it appear that the two accused went to a shop, and that one of them went in and uttered the bad money, having no more in her possession, and the other stayed outside the shop, having other bad pieces of money, both may be convicted: the uttering and the possession being both joint.²

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, having in your possession—pieces of counterfeit King-Emperor's coin, known as——, knowing at the time when you became possessed of the said coins that they were counterfeit, fraudulently (or with intent that fraud might be committed) delivered the same to one AB (or attempted to induce AB to receive the same), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 240 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court [in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words]) on the said charge.

Punishment.—Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

241. Whoever delivers to any other person as genuine,¹ or attempts to induce any other person to receive as genuine, any counterfeit² coin which he knows to be counterfeit, but which he did not know to be counterfeit at the time when he took it into his possession,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine to an amount which may extend to ten times the value of the coin counterfeited, or with both.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, a coiner, delivers counterfeit Company's rupees to his accomplice B, for the purpose of uttering them. B sells the rupees to C, another utterer, who buys them knowing them to be counterfeit. C pays away the rupees for goods to D, who receives them, not knowing them to be counterfeit. D, after receiving the rupees, discovers that they are counterfeit and pays them away as if they were good. Here D is punishable only under this section, but B and C are punishable under section 239 or 240, as the case may be.

COMMENT.

This section applies to a casual utterer of base coins. Section 239 deals with professional utterers. A casual utterer may not be aware that the coin was counterfeit at the time when he took it into his possession but he is responsible if he utters it knowingly. Use of counterfeit coins knowing them to be counterfeit is sufficient for conviction under this section.³

1. 'As genuine.'—The gist of an offence under this section is that a person should deliver or attempt to induce any other person to receive as genuine a coin known to be counterfeit.⁴ Where A handed a counterfeit coin to his friend, in order to avoid its being discovered by the police in A's possession, it was held that A committed no offence under this section, because the coin was not delivered as genuine.⁵ If the Court be of opinion that the coin was not intended by the utterer to pass as a good coin, it should not convict the accused.⁶ Where a person tendered a false coin to another and asked for change which was refused on the ground that the coin was false, and he thereafter tendered it to another person, it was held that it might be presumed that after the first refusal the accused knew the coin to be bad and that his attempt thereafter to induce another person to receive it constituted an offence under this section.⁷

2. 'Counterfeit.'—See s. 28, supra. 3. 'Possession.'—See s. 235, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the coin in question is a counterfeit coin.

(2) That the accused delivered it, or attempted to induce some one to receive it.

(3) That he so delivered it, or so attempted to induce some one to receive the same, as genuine.

(4) That he, at the same time he delivered it, etc., knew the same to be a counterfeit coin.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, having in your possession—pieces of counterfeit King-Emperor's coin, known as——delivered as genuine to one AB the said coins (or attempted to induce one AB to receive the said coins as genuine) knowing at the time of the said delivery (or attempt), though not at the time when you became possessed of the said coins, that the said coins were counterfeit, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 241 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

242. Whoever, fraudulently¹ or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession² of counterfeit coin, having known at the time when he became possessed thereof that such coin was counterfeit,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Possession of counterfeit coin by person who knew it to be counterfeit when he became possessed thereof.

COMMENT.

Mere possession of a counterfeit coin is an offence under this and the following section, even though no attempt is made to pass it off, provided it was kept for a fraudulent purpose, and was originally obtained with guilty knowledge. Possession must be with intent to defraud.

1. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra. 2. 'Possession.'—See s. 235, supra.
3. 'Counterfeit.'—See s. 28, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the coin in question is a counterfeit coin.

(2) That the accused was in possession of it.

(3) That he was in possession thereof, with intent to defraud, or with intent that fraud might be committed.

The accused may tender evidence to show that he asked a skilful person to examine the coin as he doubted whether it was counterfeit or not.⁸

(4) That at the time he became so possessed thereof, he knew it to be counterfeit.

When pieces of counterfeit coin are found on one of two persons acting in guilty concert, and both knowing of the possession, both are guilty.⁹

Charge.—See s. 243.

Punishment.—Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

243. Whoever, fraudulently¹ or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession² of counterfeit coin, which is a counterfeit of the Queen's coin,³ having known at the time when he became possessed of it that it was counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence described in the last section.

1. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra. In the course of a search of the house of the accused in connection with an offence under ss. 457 and 380 of the Code, counterfeit coins were recovered from a cloth bundle kept inside a black wooden box under lock and key. The coins were examined and were found that they were counterfeit, and in fact there was no denial as to this. The defence was that the coins at one time belonged to the S estate and were sold as a part of the estate's property. The purchase was ostensibly made by one M but the accused had a half share in it, with the result that the counterfeit coins fell to his share. After the purchase it was not shown that any attempt had been made by the petitioner to pass on the coins to other persons as genuine. It was held that the important element of the offence that the accused was in possession of counterfeit coins "fraudulently, or with intent that fraud may be committed", had not been proved and, therefore, the charge under this section had not been proved against him.¹⁰

2. 'Possession.'—See s. 235, supra. Where eleven silver pieces of the size of a rupee along with thirty counterfeit rupees, all bearing the same year, were found concealed under bhusa in a locked room, the key of which was in the possession of the accused, it was held that under s. 114, Indian Evidence Act, the circumstances created a presumption of guilt in the case of the accused that the accused was in possession of the coins fraudulently or with intent to commit fraud.¹¹

3. 'Queen's coin.'—See s. 230, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 242, showing in (1) that the counterfeit coin is a counterfeit of the King's coin. It is essential to prove that at the time the accused became possessed of the coin he knew it to be counterfeit, whether he was in possession of the coin himself, or his wife, clerk or servant was in possession of the coin on his account.¹² The point of time to be considered was the time when the accused had actual or conscious possession of the counterfeit coins for determining whether he had knowledge at the time that the coins were spurious.¹³

It is difficult to establish by positive evidence that a man in whose possession counterfeit coin is found knew when it came into his possession that it was counterfeit. This difficulty is enhanced when the accused who is in a position to give an explanation refuses to give one. In such a case guilty knowledge of the accused has to be inferred from the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the accused. The fact that at the time when he came into possession of the counterfeit coin for the first time the accused knew that it was counterfeit need not necessarily be proved by positive evidence, especially when the accused refuses to give any explanation of its possession, and can be inferred from the conduct of the accused and the circumstances of the case.¹⁴ The onus to prove that the accused knew "at the time when he became possessed of the coin that it was counterfeit" is on the prosecution. Section 106 of the Evidence Act does not entitle the prosecution to throw the onus as regards the time of knowledge on the accused without any qualification, but if the prosecution has succeeded in establishing circumstances suggesting that the accused knew at the time he became possessed of the coins that they were counterfeit, then and in that case alone it would be necessary for the accused to lead evidence to show that it was not at that time that he became aware of their counterfeit character.¹⁵

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, fraudulently (or with intent that fraud might be committed) were in possession of——pieces of counterfeit King-Emperor's coin, known as——, knowing at the time when you became possessed of the said coins that they were counterfeit; and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 243 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate, omit these words)] on the said charge.

Punishment.—Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

244. Whoever, being employed in any mint lawfully established in British India, does any act, or omits what he is legally bound to do,¹ with the intention of causing any coin issued from that mint to be of a different weight or composition from the weight or composition fixed by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Person employed in mint causing coin to be of different weight or composition from that fixed by law.

COMMENT.

The law has fixed the weight and composition of various coins and has declared in what cases they shall be a legal tender. The object of this section is to secure the purity of the coinage and its exact conformity to the legal standard against the act or omission of persons employed in mints. The proof must be that the person is employed in a Government mint, and that the act or omission which is the subject of the charge was intended to cause the coin there made or issued to vary from the fixed standard. It is no part of the definition and therefore it will be no necessary part of the proof that any wrongful gain should accrue to the person charged, or that loss should be caused to the Government or the public.¹⁶ See the Indian Coinage Act.¹⁷

1. 'Legally bound to do.'—See s. 43, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused is employed in a lawfully established mint in British India.

(2) That he, during such employment, did or omitted to do, something which he was legally bound to do, which would cause any coin issued from that mint to be of a different weight or composition from that fixed by law.

(3) That he did, or omitted to do such thing with that intention.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

¹⁷ Act III of 1906.

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, being — employed as — in the——mint lawfully established in British India, did an act, to wit——, (or omitted what you were legally bound to do, to wit——,) with the intention of causing the coin——issued from the said mint to be of a different weight (or composition) from the weight (or composition) fixed by law, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 244 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

245. Whoever, without lawful authority, takes out of any mint, lawfully established in British India, any coining tool or instrument,¹ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Unlawfully taking coining instrument from mint.

COMMENT.

The substance of this offence consists in taking a coining tool without lawful authority out of any mint for the purpose of using it for making counterfeit coins.

1. 'Instrument.'—That is coining instrument.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the instrument in question is a coining tool or instrument.

(2) That it belonged to a mint lawfully established in British India.

(3) That the accused took it out of the mint without lawful authority.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, without lawful authority, did take out of a mint lawfully established in British India, to wit, the mint——, a certain coining tool (or instrument), to wit——; and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 245 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

246. Whoever fraudulently¹ or dishonestly² performs on any coin any operation which diminishes the weight or alters the composition of that coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Fraudulently or dishonestly diminishing weight or altering composition of coin.

Explanation.—A person who scoops out part of the coin and puts anything else into the cavity alters the composition of that coin.

COMMENT.

Fraudulent or dishonest diminution in the weight or composition of a coin is punishable.

1. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra. 2. 'Dishonestly.'—See s. 24, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the metal in question is a coin.

(2) That the accused performed upon such coin the operation in question.

(3) That such operation diminished its weight, or altered its composition.

(4) That the accused did as above fraudulently or dishonestly.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, fraudulently (or dishonestly) performed on the coin, to wit——, an operation which diminished its weight (or altered its composition), and you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 246 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

247. Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly performs on any of the Queen's coin any operation which diminishes the weight or alters the composition of that coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Fraudulently or dishonestly diminishing weight or altering composition of Queen's coin.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 246, showing in (1) that the coin in question is a King's coin.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—See s. 246.

248. Whoever performs on any coin any operation which alters the appearance of that coin, with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Altering appearance of coin with intent that it shall pass as coin of different description.

COMMENT.

This section refers to any operation which alters the appearance of a coin with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description. The operation, whether of gilding, or silvering, or washing, etc., must be of such a kind, and so far completed, that the coin which is subjected to it is actually altered in appearance. Thus quick-silvering of a half-pice so as to give it the appearance of a four-anna silver piece will be punishable under this section. The offence is complete as soon as the coin is altered though no fraudulent purpose can be proved. And it does not seem necessary to show that there is in fact a description of coin at all resembling or corresponding to the altered coin. The alteration, under this section, must not diminish the weight of the coin. If the weight is diminished either s. 246 or s. 247 will apply.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the metal in question is a coin.

(2) That the accused performed on such coin the operation in question.

(3) That such operation altered the appearance thereof.

(4) That the accused did as above with the intention that such coin should pass as a coin of a different description.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

In the case of a previous conviction the accused should be committed for trial to the Court of Session unless the Magistrate is competent to try the case and is of opinion that he can himself pass an adequate sentence.¹⁸

¹⁸ Criminal Procedure Code, s. 348.

Charge.—See s. 249.

249. Whoever performs on any of the Queen's coin¹ any operation which alters the appearance of that coin, with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Altering appearance of Queen's coin with intent that it shall pass as coin of different description.

COMMENT.

See Comment under the preceding section. The offence under this section is merely an aggravated form of the offence described in the last section.

1. 'Queen's coin.'—See s. 230, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 248, showing in (1) that the coin in question is a King's coin.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, did perform a certain operation, to wit——, on a piece of the King-Emperor's coin known as——, with the intention that the said coin should pass as a coin of a different description, to wit——; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 249 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate, omit these words)] on the said charge.

250. Whoever, having coin in his possession with respect to which the offence defined in section 246 or 248 has been committed, and having known at the time when he became possessed of such coin that such offence had been committed with respect to it, fraudulently¹ or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers such coin to any other person, or attempts to induce any other person to receive the same, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Delivery of coin, possessed with knowledge that it is altered.

COMMENT.

This and the following sections are intended to punish persons who are traders in spurious or altered coins. They correspond to ss. 239 and 240. There must be both possession with knowledge and fraudulent delivery.

1. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the coin in question was one with respect to which the offence defined in s. 246 or 248 was committed.

(2) That the accused was in possession of it.

(3) That at the time when he became possessed of it he knew that any of the said offences had been committed.

(4) That he delivered it to some one, or attempted to induce some one, to receive it.

(5) That he did as above with intent to defraud or with intent that fraud might be committed.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—See s. 251.

251. Whoever, having coin in his possession with respect to which the offence defined in section 247 or 249 has been committed, and having known at the time when he became possessed of such coin that such offence had been committed with respect to it, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers such coin to any other person, or attempts to induce any other person to receive the same, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.¹

COMMENT.

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence described in the last section.

1. 'And shall also be liable to fine.'—This section does not require a sentence of fine as well as imprisonment to be inflicted; the sentence of fine is optional.¹⁹

CASE.

Two persons, who carried on a business as dealers in coins, came to Moradabad and obtained an introduction to the cashier of the local branch of the Imperial Bank. They had with them a large number of coins, and they offered to the cashier a commission of three per cent., if he could change them. On further examination of these coins at the Bank the next day, the Bank officials sent for the police and the two dealers were arrested. The coins which they had brought were sent for examination to the Calcutta Mint. The report of the Mint expert, which was duly proved at the trial, showed that a considerable number of the coins tendered were old and worn coins which had been used at one time as ornaments and from which the solder had only been partially removed in order to keep up their weight, whilst many more were coins of recent date which were not much worn but had been carefully subjected to a process of clipping or filing so as to reduce their weight to the lowest limit of wastage allowable under the law. It was held that the persons who had tried to get these coins changed were guilty of an offence under this section.²⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the coin in question was one with respect to which the offence defined in s. 247 or 249 was committed.

Other points as in s. 250.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the ——— day of ———, at ———, had in your possession a coin, to wit ———, and in respect of which the offence defined in s. 246 (or s. 248) of the Indian Penal Code, had been committed, and knowing at the time when you became possessed of the said coin that such offence had been committed, you fraudulently (or with intent that fraud may be committed) delivered such coin to AB (or attempted to induce the said AB to receive the same), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 251 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

¹⁹ Joseph alias Thavasi, (1888) 1 Weir 223.

²⁰ Mahtab Rai, (1925) 48 All. 603.

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate, omit these words)] on the said charge.

252. Whoever, fraudulently¹ or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession² of coin with respect to which the offence defined in either of the sections 246 or 248 has been committed, having known at the time of becoming possessed thereof that such offence had been committed with respect to such coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

Possession of debased or altered coin by the professional dealer, with fraudulent intention, is made punishable by this section. This and the following section resemble ss. 242 and 243. Under ss. 240 and 251 the accused is punished for uttering, under this and the next section he is punished for possessing a coin in respect of which the offence defined in either s. 246 or 247 has been committed.

1. 'Fraudulently'.—See s. 25, supra. 2. 'Possession'.—See s. 235, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was in possession of a coin.

(2) That it was a coin in respect of which the offence defined in s. 246 or 248 had been committed.

(3) That the accused knew of it when he became possessed of the coin.

(4) That he was so possessed of the coin with intent to defraud, or with intent that fraud might be committed.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

253. Whoever, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of coin with respect to which the offence defined in either of the sections 247 or 249 has been committed, having known at the time of becoming possessed thereof that such offence had been committed with respect to such coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence described in the last section. See Comment on the preceding section.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 252, showing in (1) that the coin in question was a King's coin.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

254. Whoever delivers to any other person as genuine or as a coin of a different description from what it is, or attempts to induce any person to receive as genuine, or as a different coin from what it is, any coin in respect of which he knows that any such operation as that mentioned in sections 246, 247, 248, or 249 has been committed, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

been performed, but in respect of which he did not, at the time when he took it into his possession, know that such operation had been performed, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine to an amount which may extend to ten times the value of the coin for which the altered coin is passed, or attempted to be passed.

COMMENT.

Section 241 is similar to this section. Where possession is acquired innocently but on subsequent knowledge that the coin is counterfeit, if a person passes it off or attempts to pass it off as a genuine coin he will be punished under this section.

See the Metal Tokens Act, s. 3.²¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the coin in question is one with respect to which any such operation as that mentioned in s. 246, 247, 248 or 249 has been performed.

(2) That the accused delivered it to some one; or that he attempted to induce some one to receive it.

(3) That he so delivered it, or attempted to induce some one to receive it, as a genuine coin, or as a coin of a different description.

(4) That at the time he did so, he knew that it had been operated upon.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, delivered to AB (or attempted to induce AB to receive) as genuine a coin, to wit——, in respect of which an operation as is mentioned in ss. 246, 247, 248 or 249 of the Indian Penal Code, to wit——, had been performed, and you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 254 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

255. Whoever counterfeits,¹ or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting, any stamp² issued by Government³ for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with transportation for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—A person commits this offence who counterfeits by causing a genuine stamp of one denomination to appear like a genuine stamp of a different denomination.

COMMENT.

The remaining sections of this Chapter deal with offences relating to Government stamps. These stamps are impressions upon paper, or parchment, or any material used for writing made by Government, mostly for the purpose of revenue.

This section is similar to s. 241 which deals with counterfeiting of coins.

1. 'Counterfeits'.—See s. 28, supra. Engraving a stamp, like in some part to a genuine stamp, and unlike in others, and then cutting out the unlike parts, and concealing the part cut out, amounts to counterfeiting a stamp.²²

2. 'Stamp'.—This word is used in this and the following sections to denote the impression or mark set upon the paper, parchment, etc. It includes postage stamps.²³

²¹ Act I of 1889.

²² Collicot's Case, (1812) 2 Leach 1048.

²³ Indian Post Office Act, VI of 1898, ss. 16 and 17.

The word 'stamp' must be construed according to its ordinary meaning in the English language. An obliterated stamp can be a stamp in the ordinary use of the English language. A stamp does not cease to be a stamp because it is cancelled. A person selling a forged stamp, although it bears a cancellation mark, commits an offence of selling forged stamps.²⁴

3. 'Government'.—See s. 17, supra, and s. 263A (4), infra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the counterfeit was that of a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue.

(2) That the accused made such counterfeit; or that he knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, counterfeited (or knowingly performed a certain part of the process of counterfeiting, to wit——), a certain stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, to wit——, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 255 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

256. Whoever has in his possession¹ any instrument or material for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be used, for the purpose of counterfeiting any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Having possession of instrument or material for counterfeiting Government stamp.

COMMENT.

See Comment on the preceding section. This section resembles s. 235 with which it may be compared.

1. 'Possession.'—See ss. 27 and 235, supra. The proprietor of a newspaper circulating among stamp collectors and others caused a die to be made for him abroad, from which imitations or representations of a current colonial postage stamp could be produced. The only purpose for which the die was ordered by him, and was subsequently kept in his possession, was for making upon the pages of an illustrated stamp catalogue or newspaper, called "The Philatelist's Supplement", illustrations in black and white and not in colours of the colonial stamp in question, this special supplement being intended for sale as part of his newspaper. It was held that the possession of a die for making a false stamp, known to be such to its possessor, was, however innocent the use that he intended to make of it, a possession without lawful excuse within the meaning of the Post Office (Protection) Act,²⁵ 1884, s. 7(c), which says that "A person shall not...make, or, unless he shows a lawful excuse, have in his possession, any die, plate, instrument, or materials for making any fictitious stamp."¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the instrument or material in question is one usable for counterfeiting stamps.

(2) That the stamps so producible thereby are counterfeits of those issued by Government for the purposes of revenue.

(3) That the accused had such instrument or material in his possession.

²⁴ Lowden, [1914] 1 K. B. 144.

²⁵ 47 & 48 Vic., c. 76.

(4) That the same was in possession of the accused for the purpose of its being used to counterfeit such Government stamps; or that the accused knew or had reason to believe that such instrument or material was intended to be so used.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

257. Whoever makes or performs any part of the process¹ of making, or buys, or sells, or disposes of, any instrument for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe² that it is intended to be used, for the purpose of counterfeiting any stamp³ issued by Government⁴ for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Making or selling instrument for counterfeiting Government stamp.

COMMENT.

This section corresponds to s. 234.

1. 'Performs any part of the process.'—It is not necessary that the instruments should be capable of making an entire impression of a stamp.²

2. 'Reason to believe.'—See s. 26, supra.

3. 'Stamp.'—See s. 255, supra.

4. 'Government.'—See s. 17, supra, and s. 263A (4), infra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the instrument or material in question is one usable for counterfeiting stamps.

(2) That the stamps so producible thereby are counterfeits of those issued by Government for the purpose of revenue.

(3) That the accused made, or performed, some part of the process of making such instrument; or that he bought, sold, or disposed of such instrument.

(4) That he did as above in order that such instrument might be used for the purpose of counterfeiting such stamp; or that the accused knew or had reason to believe that the same was intended to be used for such purpose.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, made (or performed any part of the process of making or bought or sold or disposed of) an instrument, to wit—, for the purpose of being used (or knowing or having reason to believe that it was intended to be used) for counterfeiting a stamp, to wit—, issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 257 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

258. Whoever sells, or offers for sale, any stamp which he knows or has reason to believe to be a counterfeit of any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Sale of counterfeit Government stamp.

² Foster, (1836) 7 C. & P. 494.

COMMENT.

See Comment on s. 255, supra. A person selling a forged stamp although it bears a cancellation mark commits an offence of selling forged stamps.³

This section resembles s. 239.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the counterfeit was that of a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue.

(2) That the accused sold or offered to sell such counterfeit stamp.

(3) That when selling or offering the same for sale he knew, or had reason to believe, that the same was counterfeit.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc..) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, sold (or offered for sale) a stamp, to wit—, which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be counterfeit of the stamp—issued by the Government for the purpose of revenue, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 258 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

259. Whoever has in his possession¹ any stamp² which he knows to be a counterfeit³ of any stamp issued by Government⁴ for the purpose of revenue, intending to use, or dispose of the same as a genuine stamp, or in order that it may be used as a genuine stamp, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Having possession of counterfeit Government stamp.

COMMENT.

This section resembles s. 243.

1. 'Possession.'—See ss. 27 and 235, supra. 2. 'Stamp.'—See s. 255, supra.

3. 'Counterfeit.'—See s. 28, supra.

4. 'Government.'—See s. 17, supra, and s. 263A(4), infra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the counterfeit was that of a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue.

(2) That the accused had such counterfeit stamp in his possession.

(3) That he then knew the same to be counterfeit.

(4) That he was so possessed intending to use or dispose of the same as a genuine stamp; or that he was so possessed thereof in order that the same may be used as a genuine stamp.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, were in possession of a stamp, Exhibit—, which you knew to be a counterfeit of a stamp, to wit—, issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, intending to use (or dispose of) the same as a genuine stamp and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 259 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or the High Court).

³ Lowden, [1914] 1 K. B. 144.

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate, omit these words)] on the said charge.

260. Whoever uses as genuine any stamp, knowing it to be a counterfeit of any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Using as genuine a Government stamp known to be counterfeit.

COMMENT.

See Comment on s. 255. This section corresponds to s. 254.

Here the stamp used as genuine must be a counterfeit stamp. Hence, where a person sold a one-anna stamp as a one-rupee stamp, it was held that he had committed no offence under this section, but was guilty of cheating under s. 415.⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the counterfeit was that of a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue.

(2) That the accused knew the same to be counterfeit.

(3) That he used such counterfeit stamp with such knowledge.

(4) That he used the same as a genuine stamp.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, used as genuine a stamp, to wit—, knowing it to be a counterfeit of a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, to wit—, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 260 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate, omit these words)] on the said charge.

261. Whoever, fraudulently¹ or with intent to cause loss to the Government, removes or effaces from any substance, bearing any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, any writing or document² for which such stamp has been used, or removes from any writing or document a stamp which has been used for such writing or document, in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing or document, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Effacing writing from substance bearing Government stamp, or removing from document a stamp used for it, with intent to cause loss to Government.

COMMENT.

This section provides penalty for (1) the effacing of a writing from a stamp, and (2) the removing of a stamp from a document. The intention may be to defraud some one or to cause loss of revenue to Government. The section resembles ss. 246 and 248 which provide punishment for the alteration and defacement of a coin.

1. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra. 2. 'Document.'—See s. 29, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the stamp was issued by Government for revenue purposes.

⁴ Shuroop Chunder Doss, (1865) 2 W. R. (Cr.) 65.

- (2) That such stamp had been used as such on the substance in question.
 (3) That the accused removed or effaced from such stamp some of the writing for which it had been used.
 (4) That he did so with intent to defraud or to cause loss to Government.
 Or prove points (1) and (2) as above, and further—
 (3) That such stamp had been used as such for a writing or document.
 (4) That the accused removed the stamp from such writing or document.
 (5) That he did so in order that such stamp might be used for a different writing or document.
 (6) That he did so with intent to defraud or to cause loss to Government.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, fraudulently (or with intent to cause loss to the Government) [removed (or effaced) from any substance bearing any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue any writing (or document) for which such stamp has been used] or [removed from any writing (or document) a stamp which had been used for such writing (or document) in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing (or document)] and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 261 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session.)

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate, omit these words)] on the said charge.

262. Whoever, fraudulently¹ or with intent to cause loss to the Government, uses for any purpose a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, which he knows to have been before used, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Using Government stamp known to have been before used.

COMMENT.

Under this section fraudulent use of a stamp already used is made punishable.

1. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra. The mere affixing to a letter of a postal stamp which has been previously used does not of itself prove fraud or an intent to cause loss to Government;⁵ but if a person uses a postage stamp twice he will be punished under this section.⁶

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the stamp was issued by Government for the purpose of revenue.

- (2) That it had been already used for such purpose.
 (3) That the accused afterwards again used such stamp.
 (4) That when he used it again he knew that it had been before used.
 (5) That he again so used the stamp with intent to defraud or to cause loss to Government.⁷

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class.

263. Whoever, fraudulently¹ or with intent to cause loss to Government, erases or removes from a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, any mark, put or impressed upon such stamp for the purpose of denoting that the same has been used, or knowingly has in his pos-

Erasure of mark denoting that stamp has been used.

⁵ Niaz Ahmad, (1881) 1 A. W. N. 56.

session² or sells or disposes of any such stamp from which such mark has been erased or removed, or sells or disposes of any such stamp which he knows to have been used,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

Under this section three things are punishable : (1) erasure or removal of a mark denoting that a stamp has been used, (2) knowingly possessing any such stamp, and (3) selling or disposing of any such stamp.

1. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra.

2. 'Knowingly has in his possession.'—Under the second part of the section it is enough to prove possession of a revenue stamp from which any mark put upon it for denoting its use has been erased or removed, with knowledge of such erasure or removal. It is not necessary to prove that the possession was fraudulent or with intent to cause loss to Government. Neither is it necessary to prove, under that part of the section, that the erasure or removal had been by the accused person or that he had any connection with it. But it must be proved that the marks or notations that had been erased or removed were marks or notations denoting that the stamp had already been used for revenue purposes.⁸

3. 'Used.'—'Used' means used upon documents which required to be stamped in accordance with law.

When there is nothing to show that the stamp had been used upon a document for revenue purposes as required by law and the traces of marks or notations left are consistent with their being private marks or notations, the offence is not established, e.g. when the marks of a rubber stamp on a Court-fee stamp, such as they are, do not indicate that it was the stamp of a Court of law.⁹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the stamp was issued by Government for the purpose of revenue.

(2) That it had been used for that purpose.

(3) That it bore a mark or impression denoting that it had been so used.

(4) That the accused removed or erased such mark or impression.

(5) That when he so removed or erased such mark or impression, he did so with an intention to defraud or to cause loss to Government.¹⁰

Or prove points (1), (2), (3) and (4) as above, and further—

(5) That the accused had possession of such stamp in such cancelled condition; or that such stamp, in such cancelled condition, was sold or disposed of by the accused.

(6) That the accused at the time knew that such mark or impression had been so removed or erased.

(7) That he had a fraudulent intention, or had the intention to cause loss to Government, when he had such possession, or made such sale or disposal.

Or prove points (1), (2) and (3) as above, and further—

(4) That the accused sold or disposed of such stamp.

(5) That he, when selling or disposing of the same, knew that it had been so used.

(6) That he had a fraudulent intention, or had the intention to cause loss to Government, when so selling or disposing of it.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, or Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

Prohibition of fictitious stamps.

263A. (1) Whoever—

(a) makes, knowingly utters, deals in or sells any fictitious stamp, or knowingly uses for any postal purpose any fictitious stamp, or

(b) has in his possession, without lawful excuse, any fictitious stamp, or

(c) makes or, without lawful excuse, has in his possession any die, plate, instrument or materials for making any fictitious stamp, shall be punished with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.

(2) Any such stamp, die, plate, instrument or materials in the possession of any person for making any fictitious stamp may be seized and shall be forfeited.

(3) In this section “fictitious stamp” means any stamp falsely purporting to be issued by Government for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage or any facsimile or imitation or representation, whether on paper or otherwise, of any stamp issued by Government for that purpose.

(4) In this section and also in sections 255 to 263, both inclusive, the word “Government” when used in connection with, or in reference to, any stamp issued for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage, shall, notwithstanding anything in section 17, be deemed to include the person or persons authorized by law to administer executive government in any part of India, and also in any part of Her Majesty’s dominions or in any foreign country.

COMMENT.

This section is exactly the same as s. 7 of the English Post Office Act, 1884.¹¹

Object.—This section was added by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (III of 1895), s. 2, and is intended to give full effect to what is known as the Vienna Convention in respect of postage, and it provides for making it an offence to make fictitious stamps, which are defined to be stamps purporting to be used for purposes of postage whether by the British or any foreign Government. It was introduced at the instance of the Post Office for the purpose of stopping the use of fictitious stamps on letters coming from abroad.

Possession of a fictitious stamp without lawful excuse is an offence. The proprietor of a newspaper circulating among stamp-collectors and others caused a die to be made for him abroad from which imitations or representations of a current colonial postage stamp could be produced. The only purpose for which the die was ordered by him, and was subsequently kept in his possession, was for making upon the pages of an illustrated stamp catalogue or newspaper called “The Philatelist’s Supplement,” illustrations in black and white and not in colours of the colonial stamp in question, this special supplement being intended for sale as part of his newspaper. It was held that the possession of a die for making a false stamp, known to be such to its possessor, was, however innocent the use that he intended to make of it, a possession without lawful excuse.¹²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused made, knowingly uttered, dealt in, or sold the fictitious stamp in question, or knowingly used it for any postal purposes; or

(2) That he had in his possession, without lawful excuse, such stamps; or

(3) That he made, or, without lawful excuse, had in his possession any die, plate, instrument, or materials for making such stamp.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first class.

CHAPTER XIII.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

THE offences punishable by this Chapter are not defined with reference to any precise standard of weight or measure established by law. A false weight or measure here signifies that—taking the law or the ordinary usage of the place, or the common understanding of the parties, to have fixed on certain known instrument of weight or measure, with reference to which two persons deal together—the false dealer by deceit substitutes another weight or measure in order to defraud.¹

The Legislature has, however, not left the matter quite at large. The Standards of Weight Act,² 1939, has fixed the standard weights of a tola, seer, maund, pound, ounce, hundredweight, and ton. The Measures of Length Act³ makes the imperial yard for the United Kingdom the legal standard measure of length in British India.

The Bombay Legislature has passed the Bombay Weights and Measures Act (Bom. XV of 1932), by which the weights are standardized at a Bombay seer of 80 tolas, and measures at the British yard of 36 inches. In the Punjab weights and measures have been standardized by the Punjab Weights and Measures Act (Punjab Act XII of 1941).

Under Acts passed by local Legislatures certain officers in every presidency and district towns in India are required to keep standards of such retail weights and measures in use throughout a particular town or district.⁴

264. Whoever fraudulently uses any instrument for weighing¹ which he knows to be false,² shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Fraudulent use of false instrument for weighing.

COMMENT.

The sections relating to weights make no mention of standard weights. In every place there are well-known customary weights, and, if any resident of the place or other person, knowing that a weight is less than the customary weight which it purports to be, uses the weight dishonestly, he commits fraud and may be punished under Chapter XIII.⁵

As to inspection of weights and measures by police, s. 153, Criminal Procedure Code, provides : “(1) Any Officer in charge of a police-station may, without a warrant, enter any place within the limits of such station for the purpose of inspecting or searching for any weights or measures or instruments for weighing, used or kept therein, whenever he has reason to believe that there are in such place any weights, measures or instruments for weighing which are false. (2) If he finds in such place any weights, measures or instruments for weighing which are false, he may seize the same, and shall forthwith give information of such seizure to a Magistrate having jurisdiction.”

Ingredients.—This section requires two essentials :—

1. Fraudulent use of an instrument for weighing.
2. Knowledge that such instrument is false.

1. ‘Fraudulently uses any instrument for weighing.’—See s. 25, supra. Intention is an essential part of the offence under this section.⁶ “The intention however must be alleged in laying the charge, though it may be a matter of inference only, from the fact of the possession, and the attending circumstances as manifesting the purpose, and the inference may of course be rebutted...But where the incorrectness of the scale is so visible, and there is no attempt to cover or conceal it, there can be no ground for imputing fraud from that defect alone; the circumstances negative the intention of fraud, and no charge would lie against the party using such a balance. On the other hand a false balance artfully contrived to elude detection in the use of it, carries with it a presumption of fraudulent intention, which properly brings it within the scope of the chapter."⁷ A one tolah below weight in a five seers only represents a fair wear and tear, and is no evidence of a fraudulent intention.⁸

2. 'Knows to be false.'—The word 'false' in this and the following sections means different from the instrument, weight or measure which the offender and the person defrauded have fixed upon, expressly or by implication, with reference to their mutual dealings.⁹ A railway company kept a weighing machine, which for a fortnight had been so out of repair that, when anything was weighed by it, the weight appeared to be four pounds more than was really the weight. It was held that the company was liable to be convicted for having in its possession a weighing machine which on examination was found to be incorrect or otherwise unjust.¹⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the instrument in question is one for weighing.

(2) That it is a false one.

(3) That the accused knew it to be false.

(4) That he used it knowing it to be so.

(5) That he did as above with intent to defraud.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Summary trial.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, fraudulently used a certain instrument for weighing, to wit——, knowing it to be false at the time of using it, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 264 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

265. Whoever fraudulently¹ uses any false² weight or false measure of length or capacity, or fraudulently uses any weight or any measure of length or capacity as a different weight or measure from what it is, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Fraudulent use of false weight or measure.

COMMENT.

Section 264 punishes one who uses a false balance; this section punishes one who uses a false weight or measure.

To ascertain whether a measure is false or not, the only proper test to apply is that of the measure, and the same articles must be measured in each case, and proof should be adduced that this had been done. The weight of the grain that a measure is found to hold is no evidence of its capacity, as compared with that of another measure unless the very same grain is used.¹¹

1. 'Fraudulently.'—See s. 25, supra.

2. 'False.'—See s. 264, supra. The false weight or measure must be a prescribed weight or measure. Where the accused sold liquor, measuring it with a glass which was not the prescribed measure and of which they falsely misrepresented the capacity, it was held that they had not committed an offence under this section but one under s. 415.¹² Selling by means of an unstamped measure does not, in the absence of evidence of fraud or falsity of the measure, constitute this offence.¹³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the weight or measure is a false one or that it is different from what it was used as.

(2) That the accused used such false or different weight or measure.

(3) That he did as above with intent to defraud.

The prosecution must lead some evidence to prove that the accused knew the measures to be incorrect and in the absence of any such evidence there could be no presumption of fraudulent intention on the part of the accused.¹⁴

A conviction under this section cannot be maintained where there is no complaint by a purchaser.¹⁵

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Summary trial.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, or on about the—day of—, at—, [fraudulently used a false weight (or false measure of length or capacity)], or [fraudulently used a weight (or measure of length or capacity) as a different weight (or measure) from what it was], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 265 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

266. Whoever is in possession¹ of any instrument for weighing, or of any weight, or of any measure of length or capacity, which he knows to be false, and intending that the same may be fraudulently used,² shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Being in possession of false weight or measure.

COMMENT.

This section punishes a person who is in possession of a false weight or measure just as ss. 235, 239 and 240 punish a person who is in possession of counterfeit coins and s. 259 punishes a person who is in possession of a counterfeit stamp.

1. 'Possession.'—The mere possession of false weights or measures will not of itself raise any strong presumption of fraud, as the weights or measures may have been put away so as not to be used. The fraudulent intent will be shown greatly by the place where they are found. Suppose a false balance was found fixed to a tradesman's counter where he was accustomed to sell his goods, and there was no other in the place. There would be, in this case, the strongest possible presumption that the possession was not innocent. On the other hand, suppose he had true balances in his shop, but an untrue one stowed away in an attic with a lot of lumber, there the presumption would be against fraud.

But the mere possession of the false instrument, if such possession cannot be satisfactorily explained and accounted for, is sufficient ground for presuming an intention to use it fraudulently.

As to the definition of the word "possession", see s. 27, supra.

2. 'Knows to be false... fraudulently used.'—It is necessary to prove that the accused knew the scales to be false and intended to use them fraudulently. The mere possession of the scales, or evidence of their use, with a string not accurately tied at the centre of the beam, so that one scale outweighed the other, but which could be shifted at any time, and might sometimes have been accurately tied, was held not of itself sufficient evidence of fraud.¹⁶ The mere possession of weights in excess of the authorized standard will not support a conviction.¹⁷

A measure is 'false' within the meaning of this section if it is something other than what it purports to be. The fact that an offence may have been committed under the Weights and Measures Act (Bom. IV of 1932) does not make the measure false within the meaning of s. 266. Where both the purchaser and seller are aware of the actual measure being used, there is no fraudulent intent as required by this section. It is only when the seller purports to sell according to a certain standard, and sells below that standard, that he can be said to be guilty of fraud. Where it was agreed between the seller and the purchaser that a particular measure was to be used in measuring the commodity sold, it was held that, even though the measure was not of the standard requirement, it was not "false" and there was no fraudulent intent within the meaning of s. 264 of the Code.¹⁸

A person who professes to sell by a certain standard of weight is bound to take reasonable care that the weights he uses are not defective.¹⁹ He is bound to see that the measure is correct according to that standard and if the measure varies from the standard so as to give the seller a considerable advantage, the Courts are justified in inferring fraud.²⁰ The accused professed to sell by weights of a certain English standard. It was admitted that the weights were habitually used and were in the possession of the accused for the purpose of being used. The weights were all deficient, but the Sessions Judge was of opinion that there was an absence of fraud, because the weights had been openly and therefore presumably ignorantly used. It was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.²¹

'Fraudulently'—See s. 25, supra. Where standard weights are not prescribed no presumption of fraud can arise in respect of short weights, and a conviction under this section cannot be obtained unless the element of fraud is strictly proved.²²

Where a search took place after dark without proper precautions, and there was absence of proper description of the weights seized and there was silence of the record as to what standard weights were used for purposes of comparison, and there was no proof of knowledge or fraudulent intent on the accused's part, it was held that these were fatal defects in a prosecution under this section.²³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the instrument, or the measure, or the weight in question is false.

To prove that the weight or measure is false, comparison should be made with standard weights or measures. Some reasonable allowance should be made for wear and tear and for the rough-and-ready methods of bazaar shop-keepers.²⁴

(2) That the accused was in possession of the same.

(3) That he knew the same to be false.

(4) That he intended that such false weight, etc., should be used to defraud some one.

The prosecution has to prove that the person in possession of a false measure knew it to be false and was in possession intending that the same may be fraudulently used. It is not sufficient that the capacity of the measures seized did not conform to the standard fixed by Government. If a dealer has a measure in his shop which has been tested by the Government and certified to be a proper measure, there is no reason to presume that he could have known that it was not a correct measure or that at the time when the stamp was put on this measure it was not up to the prescribed standard.

There is in law no duty cast on a shop-keeper to have the measures tested periodically and it cannot be presumed that the shop-keeper was using the measure fraudulently merely by the fact that he did not have his measures tested regularly and the measure is found to be short. There must be evidence that he was aware of the fact that the measures were smaller than the standard ones.²⁵ But where a shop-keeper keeps and regularly uses for the purposes of his trade in his shop weights which are deficient, the only reasonable inference is that he knows them to be deficient and is using them fraudulently.¹

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Summary trial.

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, were in possession of a certain instrument for weighing (or of a certain weight, or of a certain measure of length or capacity), to wit——, knowing it, at the time of your possession, to be false, and intending that the same might be fraudulently used, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 266 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

267. Whoever makes, sells or disposes of any instrument for weighing, or any weight, or any measure of length or capacity which he knows to be false,¹ in order that the same may be used as true, or knowing that the same is likely to be used as true, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Making or selling false weight or measure.

COMMENT.

This section punishes a person who makes, sells or disposes of a false balance, weight or measure. The object is to prevent the circulation of false scales, weights or measures.

1. 'False.'—See s. 264, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the instrument, or the measure, or the weight in question is false.

(2) That the accused either made, sold, or disposed of the same.

(3) That he then knew it to be false.

(4) That he so made, sold, or disposed of it, in order that it might be used as true; or that he knew that it was likely to be used as true.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Summary trial.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, made (or sold, or disposed of) a certain instrument for weighing (or a certain weight, or a certain measure of length or capacity), to wit——, knowing at the time of making (or selling or disposing of) it, to be false, in order that the said instrument might be used as true, (or knowing that the said instrument was likely to be used as true), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 267 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

CHAPTER XIV.

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING THE PUBLIC HEALTH, SAFETY, CONVENIENCE, DECENCY AND MORALS.

268. A person is guilty of a public nuisance, who does any act or is guilty of an illegal omission¹ which causes any common injury, danger or annoyance to the public or to the people in general who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity,² or which must necessarily cause injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right.³

A common nuisance is not excused on the ground that it causes some convenience or advantage.

COMMENT.

Nuisances are of two kinds : (1) Public, and (2) Private.

(1) 'Public nuisance' or common nuisance is an offence against the public, either by doing a thing which tends to the annoyance of the whole community in general, or by neglecting to do anything which the common good requires. It is an act affecting the public at large, or some considerable portion of them; and it must interfere with rights which members of the community might otherwise enjoy. It depends in a great measure upon the number of the houses and the concourse of people in the vicinity; and the annoyance or neglect must be of a real and substantial nature. Acts which seriously interfere with the health, safety, comfort, or convenience of the public generally, or which tend to degrade public morals, have always been considered to be public nuisances.

Persons who carry on offensive trades and thereby, or by any other offensive means, corrupt the air, or by any means cause loud and continued noises and thereby occasion injury or annoyance to those dwelling in the neighbourhood in respect of their health, or comfort and convenience of living or the value of their property, are liable to a prosecution for causing a public nuisance.¹ "It does not appear to me a sine qua non that such an annoyance as this should injuriously affect every member of the public within its range of operation. It is sufficient that it should affect people in general who dwell in the vicinity."² A brew-house, glass-house or swine-yard may be a public nuisance if it is shown that the trade is such as to render the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable. Erecting gunpowder mills or keeping gunpowder magazines near a town, keeping large quantities of naphtha near dwelling-houses, blasting stone near a highway, keeping large quantities of materials for making fire-works near a street,³ working a rice-husking machine at night in a residential quarter of a city,⁴ and keeping disorderly houses, e.g., disorderly inns, bawdy houses, gaming houses, and committing acts of indecency in public places, have been held to be public nuisances.

A public nuisance can only be the subject of one indictment, otherwise a party might be ruined by a million suits. An indictment will fail if the nuisance complained of only affects one or few individuals.

As to when an individual can bring a civil action in respect of a public nuisance, see the authors' Law of Torts, 14th edition.

(2) 'Private nuisance' is defined to be anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements or hereditaments of another, and not amounting to trespass. It is an act affecting some particular individual or individuals as distinguished from the public at large. It is in the quantum of annoyance that public nuisance differs from private. It cannot be the subject of an indictment, but may be the ground of a civil action for damages or an injunction, or both.

The various sections of this Chapter deal with everything that is regarded as nuisance in English law. Section 290 is a general provision intended to cover a case not specially provided for.

The definition of 'public nuisance' applies to all Central Acts and Regulations made after 14th January, 1887.⁵

Ingredients.—The section requires two essentials :—

1. A person must do an act or must be guilty of an illegal omission.

2. Such act or omission must cause—

(a) common injury, danger, or annoyance (i) to the public, or (ii) to the people in general who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity, or

(b) injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right.

1. 'Person...does any act or is guilty of an illegal omission.'—Section 11 defines the word 'person.'

The word 'act' is defined in s. 33, supra. It is used in this section in the sense of positive conduct only, not negative conduct or omission to do something as the expression "illegal omission" is specifically used in conjunction with it.

The word 'illegal', as defined in s. 43, is applicable to everything which is an offence or which is prohibited by law, or which furnishes ground for a civil action. Every omission causing a nuisance is not punishable. The omission must be 'illegal'. Thus, a person omitting to fence a wall on a private ground within eight yards of a highway,⁶ and a person omitting to keep his ponies⁷ or his pigs⁸ from straying, were held to have committed no nuisance. Similarly, where the lombardars of a village, who were making arrangements when an annual fair was held at that village for the public sanitation of the place, did not make the usual arrangements when a fair was held and for which they were convicted of a public nuisance, it was held that their omission to make proper sanitary arrangements was not an illegal omission within the meaning of this section.⁹

Liability of absent proprietor for nuisance committed by his servant.—Where the use of premises gives rise to a public nuisance it is, generally, the occupier for the time being who is liable for it, and not the absent proprietor.¹⁰

2. 'Causes any common injury, danger or annoyance to the public...who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity.'—The injury contemplated in this section must be common, i.e., it must affect the public and not any solitary individual. Thus, a person trotting rams trained to fight in a market-place,¹¹ a person fouling the water of a streamlet by putting into it bundles of stalks of tur plants,¹² a person throwing dust and sweeping on the road in front of his house and thus making the atmosphere noxious to health,¹³ a woman keeping on her premises vegetable matter which caused a smell offensive to persons using the public street,¹⁴ a person obstructing or encroaching upon any part of a public highway,¹⁵ a person allowing prickly-pear to spread on to a road used by the public,¹⁶ a person fixing platforms to his shops for shop-keepers to sit, but which encroached on a public road,¹⁷ were held guilty of a public nuisance. Throwing rubbish into one's own garden does not amount to a public nuisance.¹⁸ It should be noted, however, that every act which causes an offensive odour does not necessarily constitute this offence.¹⁹ Villagers accumulating filth and manure in their village are not guilty of public nuisance.²⁰

The 'annoyance' must also be caused to the general public. An indictment will not lie for that which is a nuisance only to a few inhabitants of a particular place. Where, therefore, from the noise made by a tinman in carrying on his trade three members of an inn were disturbed in the occupation of their chambers, it was held that the nuisance was not of a sufficiently general extent to support an indictment.²¹ The annoyance of a few residents of a single house is not sufficient to constitute a public nuisance. Where the complainant and his tenants were disturbed by the sounds made by the accused's theatre-band from 12 noon to 4 p.m. and 8 p.m. to midnight every day, it was held that the annoyance caused to the residents of a single house was not sufficient to show that the annoyance made by the theatre-band constituted a public nuisance.²² The defendant had converted his land near a public highway into a shooting ground where persons came to shoot with rifles at a target, and also at pigeons. As the pigeons which were fired at frequently escaped, persons collected outside of the ground, and in the neighbouring fields to shoot at them as they strayed, causing a great noise and disturbance, and doing mischief by the shot. It was held that the act of the accused amounted to a public nuisance.²³ Again, the injury or annoyance must not be fleeting or evanescent.²⁴ It must be such as reasonable persons would complain of.²⁵

The word "public" includes any class of the public or any community (s. 12). The expression "people in general" means a body or considerable number of persons.¹ This section does not apply to acts or omissions calculated to offend the sentiments of a class, or a person of particularly refined susceptibilities.² Lex non facit votis delicatorem—the law makes no allowance for the susceptibilities of the hypersensitive. "In this country [India] it must often happen that acts are done by the followers of a creed which must be offensive to the sentiments of those who follow other creeds. The erection of a place of worship in a particular spot is likely to offend the sentiments of adherents of other creeds residing in the neighbourhood, but the Penal Code does not regard such an act as a public nuisance."³ That sort of annoyance which the section aims at is not the kind of nuisance which the religious ideas of a class of people may suffer on account of an otherwise innocent act of another section of the public; it is not intended to apply to acts calculated to offend the sentiments of a class or section of the public.⁴ Similarly, the slaughtering of kine by the Mahomedans may injure the susceptibilities of the Hindus but it will not be deemed to be a public nuisance unless the act is done in such places or such a manner as to be a nuisance.⁵ It is the legal right of every person to make such use of his own property as he may think fit, provided that in doing so he does not cause real injury to others or offend against the law, even though he may thereby hurt the susceptibilities of others.⁶ The scope of this section is to protect the public or people in general, as distinguished from the members of a sect.

The Allahabad High Court has held in a case that annoyance to one individual is sufficient. Where a public servant, whose duty it was to keep the streets clean, saw somebody easing himself and, therefore, he reported it in his official capacity, and gave evidence of the act, it was held that it was a reasonable inference to draw that he was annoyed.⁷ This was really a case under a Municipal Act affecting people passing along a public thoroughfare.

No nuisance where there is no annoyance to public.—A prostitute visiting a dak bungalow at the request of a person staying there;⁸ a person committing bare sollicitation of chastity;⁹ a person soliciting passers-by on a public road for purposes of prostitution;¹⁰ a person urinating in a public place in a village having no public urinals;¹¹ a person merely placing cowdung cakes by the side of a road to dry;¹² a person placing a cot temporarily on a public road;¹³ a person selling fish near or on a public road;¹⁴ a person enclosing land which was a village site and property of Government;¹⁵ a person refusing to have any social intercourse with persons belonging to shumsees or to associate with them as Hindus;¹⁶ a person skinning an animal which has died a natural death;¹⁷ and a watchman shouting at night, jugte raho, jugte raho (wake up, wake up) in order to scare thieves from the house of his master and thus disturbing the sleep of a neighbour,¹⁸ were held to have committed no offence under this section.

Whether letting of clean water on to a public road is a public nuisance will depend on various matters, viz. the quantity, the frequency of the act, the locality, the feeling of the ordinary public who frequent the locality, etc.¹⁹

Gambling.—A common gaming-house to which every one who chooses to pay is able to go is necessarily a nuisance and no evidence of any actual annoyance to the public is in such a case required. But a person who admits gamblers into his house and every person who games therein are not guilty of this offence in the absence of such evidence.²⁰ Where a lessee of a house permitted disorderly people to use it for gambling and thereby caused annoyance to the public, he was convicted of this offence.²¹ Persons who sat on a public road outside a village, and induced villagers to gamble,²² and persons who gambled in a market-place,²³ were held to have committed a public nuisance. Similarly, where the accused allowed a large crowd of people to collect near their shops with a view to carry on satta (gambling) transactions and the crowd was so great as to stop the traffic in the street for half an hour, the Allahabad High Court held that they were guilty of public nuisance. It observed: "If a crowd collects and obstructs the traffic so as to cause a nuisance, the person who is directly responsible for the crowd collecting is obviously not less but more guilty than the other persons who form the crowd and this would be equally the case whether he were inside or outside his shop at the precise moment when the police appeared. No one is allowed to make use of his premises in such a way as to interfere with the rights of the public."²⁴ The Lahore High Court has held that the mere fact that traffic has been obstructed by the assembling of customers outside a shop, for the purpose of buying satta tickets which the shop-keeper had offered for sale, was insufficient to support the conviction of the shop-keeper under s. 290, as the mere offer of satta tickets for sale could not, by itself, be the source of any nuisance to the public. The customers could purchase tickets without crowding in front of the shop or blocking the traffic.²⁵

The Calcutta High Court has ruled that gambling is not an offence as is defined in this section. Where, therefore, certain persons were found to have gambled at a place where the Gambling Act was not in force and convicted under s. 290, it was held that the conviction was bad.¹ In a Burma case, the Court observed: "It is quite clear that, however pernicious may be the results of gambling, whether in a private house or in a common gaming-house, the mere act of gambling cannot be regarded as a public nuisance within the Penal Code. It would be as reasonable to punish people who had pwes or keep grogshops as being guilty of a public nuisance on the ground that pwes and drinking frequently 'endanger the public peace and safety'".²

Shop-window.—The accused, who had a toy shop, exhibited in the windows of their shop, overlooking a public road, certain clock-work toys during the Diwali festival. A large crowd of people collected on the road to witness the toys; in consequence of which there were dangerous rushes, several persons were knocked down and great obstruction and danger were caused to those using the road. The accused were asked by the police to stop the exhibition but they did not obey. On these facts, the Magistrate convicted the accused of offences under ss. 283 and 114. It was held that there was obstruction, danger and injury to the persons using the public way, which amounted to public nuisance.³

Lawful cremation no nuisance.—Where persons entitled to use a particular spot dedicated for the communal purpose of cremation, use it for that purpose in a manner neither unusual nor calculated to aggravate the inconveniences necessarily incident to such an act as it is generally performed in this country, they cannot be convicted of public nuisance on the ground that their act caused material annoyance and discomfort to persons near the place on the occasion referred to.⁴ But the owner of a private cremation ground may be liable for nuisance if he allows the cremation of bodies upon that ground to be so performed as to annoy or endanger the lives and properties of persons living in the neighbourhood.⁵

Offending sentiments of class no nuisance.—Where Mahomedans residing in a Hindu village, erected in the neighbourhood of a Hindu temple, a shed containing a religious symbol;⁶ where a person cut up meat on his verandah and exposed it to the sight of persons passing along the road, among whom were some Jains, whose temple was close by;⁷ where a person kept a shop open for the sale of meat though the sight of meat was offensive to the sentiments of a section of the public;⁸ and where Mahomedans for a religious purpose killed and cut up two cows before sunrise in a private compound partly visible from a public road;⁹ where, on the occasion of bakri-eeed, the accused killed a cow at dawn, in a semi-private place, and the killing was seen by some Hindus walking along a path fifty-feet away,¹⁰ this offence was held not to have been committed. But it would be a public nuisance if a person wilfully slaughtered cattle in a public street so that the groans and blood of the poor beasts were heard and seen by passers-by.

3. 'Which must necessarily cause injury, etc., to persons who may have occasion to use any public right.'—The persons referred to in this clause can seek a criminal remedy for apprehended injury. Under this clause common injury to the public or neighbours need not be shown; any individual might complain, provided he is interfered with in respect of a public right, e.g., obstruction caused by building over a part of a public street. Whoever appropriates any part of a street by building over it infringes the right of the public quoad the part built over, and thereby commits public nuisance under this section.¹¹ If any portion, however small, of a public street is encroached upon, the inevitable result must be to cause obstruction to persons who may have occasion to use the highway, for the public is entitled to use every inch of a road that has been dedicated to the public.¹²

The Calcutta High Court held in a case where persons placed a bamboo stockade across a tidal navigable river for the purpose of fishing, although they left in such stockade a narrow opening for the passage of boats, which passage was kept closed except on the actual passage of boats, that they were guilty of public nuisance.¹³ But subsequently it was held that an encroachment, however slight, on a tidal navigable river would not constitute this offence. There must be some evidence that such encroachment caused one of the results specified in this section.¹⁴ The Lahore High Court¹⁵ has agreed with the view expressed in the former case and has dissented from the view expressed in the latter case.

A person who fills up a portion of a ditch or drain which forms part of a public way and which belongs to the public¹⁶ is guilty of this offence. Similarly, letting loose cattle at night on a road amounts to this offence.¹⁷

Where the riparian owner of land on one bank of a river threw up an embankment on his own land to protect his fields from flood; and this resulted in accumulation of water on the fields of owners of land on the other side of the river causing injury to them, it was held that such an embankment even if it tended to cause injury to some owners of property could not be described as a public nuisance and is not punishable.¹⁸

4. 'Nuisance not excused on the ground that it causes some convenience or advantage.'—It is immaterial whether the act complained of is convenient to a large number of the public than its inconveniences, but the fact that the act complained of facilitates the lawful exercise of their rights by part of the public may show that it is not a nuisance to any of the public.¹⁹ If a public nuisance is proved, it is generally useless to set up counterbalancing benefits; nor in deciding whether a thing is or is not a public nuisance can the good it does be weighed against the public annoyance which it causes.²⁰

No prescriptive right can be acquired to commit nuisance.—No prescriptive right can be acquired to maintain, and no length of time can legalize, a public nuisance. Though twenty years' user may bind the right of an individual, yet the public have a right to demand the suppression of a nuisance, though of a longer standing.²¹ But a long possession or enjoyment of what is said to be a nuisance may give to the objection of the person so possessing or enjoying it the character of a bona fide dispute as to title such as might have the effect of ousting the jurisdiction of the Magistrate under ss. 133 and 137 of the Criminal Procedure Code and making the question a proper one for a civil Court.²²

Liability of master for acts of his servants.—Under English law the criminal liability of a master for the acts of his servants in cases of public nuisance is an exception to the general rule that he who does a criminal act is alone guilty. The owner of works, carried on for his profit by his agents, is liable to be indicted for a public nuisance caused by acts of his workmen in carrying on the works, though done by them without his knowledge and contrary to his general orders.²³ The Calcutta High Court has differed from this view. Where the proprietors and the manager of a mill were prosecuted on a complaint that the working of the mill was a nuisance, and it appeared that the proprietors were not residents in the locality and there was no allegation of abetment by them, it was held that the person liable, where the user of premises gives rise to a nuisance, was the occupier for the time being whoever he might be, and the proprietors were therefore not guilty of public nuisance.²⁴

Liability of joint owners.—A joint owner is responsible in law for nuisance caused by his property, even though he is not in actual enjoyment of the property.²⁵

Prosecution under Criminal Procedure Code not condition precedent.—A prosecution under this section is not illegal on the ground that proceedings have not previously been taken under the Criminal Procedure Code.¹

Civil and criminal liability.—Nuisances punishable under the Code may be made the subject of a civil action before or without prosecution. A person aggrieved by the erection of a building in a public thoroughfare, or on the waste land of a town or village, is entitled to institute a suit in a civil Court for its removal, instead of preferring a complaint to the Magistrate.²

Abatement of nuisance.—A person cannot take the law into his own hands and abate nuisance contrary to the provisions of s. 26 of the Indian Easements Act, 1882.³ Complainants were re-building their houses. A portion of the superstructure was alleged to be an encroachment on a portion of a public street and the accused gathered for the purpose of abating what they considered to be a public nuisance and demolished a portion of the terrace and the walls which stood on the encroached portion. It was found that there was encroachment and the accused demolished the portion encroaching. The lower Court held that the act of the complainants in so building would amount to public nuisance and held that the accused could not be found guilty of the offence of mischief and consequently could not constitute an unlawful assembly within the meaning of s. 141. It was held that the accused were guilty of mischief and as their common object in gathering on the scene was for the purpose of causing wrongful loss to the complainants, they might properly be deemed to have been guilty of rioting also.⁴

Statutory authority to commit nuisance.—A statute may authorize and legalize acts which would otherwise amount to a nuisance.⁵

Situation.—If a party set up a noxious trade, remote from habitations and public roads, and after that new houses are built, and new roads constructed near it, the party may continue his trade, although it be a nuisance to persons inhabiting such houses or passing along such roads.⁶ But this case has been doubted in a later decision.⁷

English cases.—The following acts are held to be public nuisance :—Allowing a house near a highway to be ruinous and dangerous to the public;⁸ keeping swine in a city;⁹ making a great noise at night with a speaking trumpet;¹⁰ collecting a number of persons for pigeon shooting;¹¹ indecent exposure in an omnibus,¹² or on the roof of a house,¹³ or in a public urinal,¹⁴ or in a place where the public go;¹⁵ negligently blasting stone in a quarry so as to endanger the safety of persons living in the vicinity;¹⁶ exhibiting by an herbalist of a picture of a man naked to his waist and covered with sores;¹⁷ keeping a brothel or a bawdy-house;¹⁸ naked bathing near a public footpath;¹⁹ keeping a booth in a public place for the purpose of showing an indecent exhibition;²⁰ exposing the naked dead body of a child on a public highway so as to shock and disgust passers-by;²¹ burning of a dead body in such a place and in such a manner as to annoy persons passing along public roads or other places where they have a right to go.²²

PRACTICE.

As to conditional orders by a Magistrate for the removal of nuisances, see ss. 133 to 143 of the Code of Criminal Procedure; and as to a Magistrate's powers of issuing orders in urgent cases where speedy remedy is desirable, see s. 144 of the same Code. The fact that no proceedings were taken under the Criminal Procedure Code cannot be pleaded as a bar to a prosecution under this section.²³ material with reference to s. 290, which provides a punishment for the offence of committing a public nuisance in any case not otherwise punishable by the Code.

269. Whoever unlawfully or negligently does any act¹ which is, and which he knows or has reason to believe to be, likely to spread 'the infection of any disease dangerous to life,'² shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Negligent act likely to spread infection of disease dangerous to life.

COMMENT.

If a man is attacked by a contagious and deadly disease and needlessly goes abroad with it in a public way, or if a person carries about a child so infected, he does what he may be supposed to know to be likely to spread the infection. And unless some lawful occasion or reason for this conduct can be shown, as that the sick person had been directed to be removed to a hospital, and that the removal was performed with due caution, the act will be an offence punishable under this section.²⁴

1. 'Does any act.'—See ss. 32 and 33, supra, as to the meaning of 'act.'

2. 'Reason to believe.'—See s. 26, supra. It must be shown that the accused had knowledge that the disease was infectious. Where the disease is generally known to be infectious there will be no difficulty.

3. 'Likely to spread the infection of any disease dangerous to life.'—The infection which is likely to be spread must be of a disease dangerous to life.

Syphilis.—A prostitute, who was suffering from syphilis, encouraged and permitted a man, whom she had assured that she was healthy, to have sexual intercourse with her, and thus communicated the disease to him, was held not liable to punishment under this section but under s. 417 or 420. West, J., said: 'Assuming that there was dangerous disease and culpable negligence, still accused's act of sexual intercourse would not spread infection without the intervention of the complaining party, himself a responsible person and himself generally an accomplice.'²⁵ This decision does not seem to be sound as the complainant cannot be deemed to be an accomplice, he being unaware of the disease. Communication of syphilis to him amounts to spreading the infection under this section.

Small-pox.—Where a mother refused to allow her daughter suffering from small-pox to be removed to a hospital in accordance with an order made by the District Magistrate unless she accompanied her, it was held that she had committed no unlawful or negligent act within the meaning of this section. To keep one's child suffering from small-pox confined to the house or to oppose the removal to hospital, where there is no evidence to show that lodgers or boarders are kept in that house, is not an act or omission as defined in s. 268.¹ It was held similarly where a person disobeyed the order of the Health Officer of the Madras Corporation, under s. 366 of the Madras Municipality Act, to remove his son, who was suffering from small-pox, to an isolation hospital, but he removed him to an isolated house.² But in England it is an offence to carry a child suffering from small-pox through a public street in which persons are passing.³

Cholera.—Where K, knowing he was suffering from cholera, travelled by a train, without informing the railway officers of his condition, and M, knowing K's condition, purchased his ticket and travelled with him, it was held that K was properly convicted under this section, because he must have known that he was doing an act likely to spread infection, and he did so negligently, in not informing the railway authorities, and that M was guilty of abetment of K's offence.⁴

Plague.—The accused resided in a plague-stricken house in the Ambala Cantonment and had been in contact with a plague patient. He was taken to the plague shed in company with the patient, who died there. The next day the accused left the shed against orders and travelled by rail to the neighbouring town of Shahabad, and from thence to Karnal. It was held that he was guilty of this offence as he had sufficient reason to believe that his act was dangerous and likely to spread infection of a disease dangerous to life.⁵

Inoculation.—Inoculation is not in itself an illegal or negligent act. On proof of a negligent dealing with a patient or patients after inoculation, with the knowledge or belief required by the section, the operator or a third person may be liable under the section.⁶ Though inoculation for small-pox may be practised lawfully and innocently, yet it must be under such guards as not to endanger the public health by communicating this infectious disease.⁷

Glanders.—Bringing a horse infected with glanders into a public place to the danger of infecting other people is an offence.⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the disease in question is (a) infectious; and (b) dangerous to life.

(2) That the accused did an act which was likely to spread infection thereof.

(3) That such act was unlawful or negligent.⁹

(4) That the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that such act of his was likely to spread the infection of such disease.¹⁰

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Triable summarily.

270. Whoever maliciously¹ does any act² which is, and which he knows or has reason to believe³ to be, likely to spread the infection of any disease dangerous to life, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Malignant act likely to spread infection of disease dangerous to life.

COMMENT.

The offence under this section is an aggravation of that which is punished by the preceding section. In the last section the act is done either 'unlawfully' or 'negligently', under this, it is done 'maliciously'. Malice aggravates the offence.

The Law Commissioners observe : "If any person died of the plague and his death could be traced to infection so caused maliciously, the person who caused it, we apprehend, would be chargeable with homicide.... It is contrary to the principle of the Code to punish acts which the doer when he committed them knew to be likely to cause certain evil results, if in fact such results were not produced, in the same manner as if such evil consequences had actually flowed from them."¹¹ This section is intended to meet those cases in which he malicious act is not the cause of death, but death could be traced to it.

1. 'Maliciously.'—See s. 153, supra. The word 'maliciously' denotes a deliberate intention on the part of the accused. It is nowhere defined in the Code but it is used in the sense of 'maliciously.' And the word "Malice in common acceptation means ill-will against a person, but in its legal sense it means a wrongful act, done intentionally, without just cause or excuse."¹²

2. 'Does any act.'—See ss. 32 and 33, supra. 3. 'Reason to believe.'—See s. 26, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1), (2) and (4) as in s. 269; and
(3) That the accused acted malignantly.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class.

271. Whoever knowingly disobeys any rule made and promulgated¹ by the Central or any Provincial Government or the Crown Representative for putting any vessel into a state of quarantine, or for regulating the intercourse of vessels in a state of quarantine with the shore or with other vessels, or for regulating the intercourse between places where an infectious disease prevails and other places, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

Any breach of a quarantine rule is punishable under this section.¹³

The motive for disobeying any rule is quite immaterial under this section. The disobedience is punishable whether any injurious consequence flows from it or not.

1. 'Any rule made and promulgated.'—The Indian Ports Act¹⁴ authorizes the making of rules in ordinary cases. For outbreaks of plague, the Epidemic Diseases Act¹⁵ has been passed.

Amendment.—The words “by the Central or any Provincial Government or the Crown Representative” were substituted for “by the Government of India or by any Government” by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order, 1937. In Burma substitute “Government” for the words “Central or by any Provincial Government or the Crown Representative.”

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the existence of the rule of quarantine.

(2) That such rule was made and promulgated by Government.

(3) That the accused knew of such rule.

(4) That he disobeyed it knowingly.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Triable summarily.

272. Whoever adulterates¹ any article of food or drink,² so as to make such article noxious as food or drink,³ intending to sell such article as food or drink, or knowing it to be likely that the same will be sold as food or drink, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

The mixing of noxious ingredients in food or drink, or otherwise rendering it unwholesome by adulteration is punishable under this section. Mere adulteration with harmless ingredients for the purpose of getting more profit is not punishable under it, e.g., mixing water with milk.¹⁶

It is essential to show that an article of food or drink has been adulterated and that it was intended to sell such article, or that it was known that it would be likely to be sold, as food or drink.¹⁷

1. 'Adulterates.'—The word 'adulterates' means mixes with any other substance, whether wholly different, or of the same kind but of inferior quality.

2. 'Any article of food or drink.'—According to the plain meaning of the section the articles of food or drink may be for human consumption, or for the use of animals.

3. 'Noxious as food or drink.'—The word 'noxious' means injurious to health, e.g. paddy soaked in dirty water;¹⁸ or toddy in which germs have germinated;¹⁹ or bread mixed with alum.²⁰ It is not an offence to sell inferior food cheap, if it is not shown to be noxious.²¹ A person who mixes pig's fat with ghi, intending to sell the mixture as food or knowing it to be likely that it will be sold as such does not commit an offence under this section. "It is true that the mixing of pig's fat with ghi and selling the mixture would be noxious to the religious and social feelings if both Hindus and Muhammadans; but I am of opinion that such an act would not come within the meaning of the expression 'noxious as food' which occurs in section 272 of the Indian Penal code. That expression obviously means unwholesome as food or injurious to health and not repugnant to one's feelings. The word 'noxious', had it stood by itself, might have had a wider meaning, but what I have to consider is the expression 'noxious as food' and not merely 'noxious'."²²

Similarly, if a person exposes for sale milk adulterated with water he does not commit an offence under this section because the mixture is not noxious or injurious as food or drink.²³ He may be guilty under a special Act.²⁴

Adulteration statutes.—Several statutes have been passed for preventing the adulteration of food. See the Bengal Food Adulteration Act (Beng. Act VI of 1919); the Central Provinces Prevention of Adulteration Act (C. P. Act II of 1919); the Behar and Orissa Food Adulteration Act (Behar Act II of 1919); the Bombay Prevention of Adulteration Act (Bom. Act V of 1925); the Assam Pure Food Act (Assam Act IV of 1932); the Punjab Pure Food Act (Punj. Act VIII of 1929); the Food and Drugs (Adulteration) Act (18 and 19 Geo. V, c. 31).

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the article in question is food or drink.

(2) That the accused adulterated it.

(3) That such adulteration rendered it noxious as food or drink.

(4) That the accused, at the time of such adulteration, intended to sell such article as food or drink, or knew it to be likely that such article would be sold as food or drink.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Triable summarily.

Order for destruction.—On a conviction under this section the Court may order the food or drink to be destroyed.²⁵

273. Whoever sells, or offers or exposes for sale, as food or drink, any article¹ which has been rendered or has become noxious, or is in a state unfit for food or drink,² knowing or having reason to believe that the same is noxious as food or drink,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

Section 272 deals with adulteration of food or drink, this section, with the sale or attempted sale of such adulterated noxious articles, and not only such food or drink. This section is more comprehensive in its provisions, and includes any article of food which has gone bad by being kept too long, or which never was at any time fit for food ; or drink which has gone bad by exposure or by length of time has been bottled, etc. For instance, the selling of toddy in which germs are germinated is an offence under it.¹

Scope.—This section is not expressly limited to food intended for human consumption. But as it comes in the Chapter dealing with offences relating to public health, etc., it seems it is not intended to include food or drink for animals. The words “the public” mean human beings in general and do not include animals. According to Webster, ‘public’ means “the general body of mankind or of a nation, state, or community.” Thus, this section does not make the sale of horse’s food of grain, or fodder, unfit for a horse to eat, an offence punishable under it.²

Ingredients.—This section has the following essentials :—

1. Selling or offering or exposing for sale as food or drink some article.
2. Such article must have become noxious or must be in a state unfit for food or drink.
3. The sale or exposure must have been made with a knowledge or reasonable belief that the article is noxious as food or drink.

1. ‘Sells, or offers or exposes for sale, as food or drink, any article.’—The article of food should have been exposed for sale. Where a butcher had killed and hung up a sheep, and on inspection the flesh was found unfit for food, but it was not removed to the shop nor exposed or offered for sale, it was held that the offence was incomplete and a conviction could not be sustained.³

‘As food or drink.’—The mere sale of an article not itself an article of food, even though it be sold with the knowledge of the vendor that it is the buyer’s intention to mix it with the ingredients of which an article of food—e.g. bread—is to be composed does not amount to an offence under this section. The appellant sold to the respondent a packet of baking powder composed of 20 per cent. of bicarbonate of soda, 40 per cent. of ground rice, and 40 per cent. of alum, the latter of which ingredients is injurious to health. It was held that such baking powder was not an article of food, and that the sale of it was not an offence.⁴

What is punishable under this section is the sale or offer or exposure for sale of noxious articles as food or drink and not the mere sale or offer or exposure for sale of noxious articles. Where, as a matter of trade, the owner of a grain pit sold the contents of the pit before it was opened at a certain sum per maund whether the grain was good or bad, and on the pit being opened it was found that a large proportion of the grain was unfit for human consumption, it was held that the vendor could not be convicted under this section.⁵

2. ‘Which has been rendered or has become noxious or is in a state unfit for food or drink.’—The word ‘noxious’ means harmful or injurious to health or unwholesome.⁶ It must be shown that the accused sold or exposed for sale an article which was to his knowledge noxious as food or drink. The accused exposed for sale some ghi which was bad. The ghi was not adulterated but somewhat rancid. It was not proved that the ghi was noxious as food or drink to the knowledge or belief of the accused. It was held that the accused was not guilty of an offence under this section.⁷ Milk is not rendered noxious by being mixed with water.⁸ Nor is ghi, when adulterated with vegetable oil.⁹ It is not an offence to sell inferior food cheap, if it is not shown to be noxious. Where a person sold an inferior quality of flour after reducing its price and the purchaser was aware of the fact, it was held that he was not guilty under this section.¹⁰ Similarly, selling wheat containing a large admixture of extraneous matter, e.g., dirt, wood, matches, charcoal, black-seeds, etc., is held to be no offence.¹¹

A grocer on being asked for two pots of cream sold two pots of cream labelled "Rich cream. This cream contains a small percentage of boron preservative to retard sourness." No indication beyond the label was given to the purchaser as to the composition of the cream, which, on analysis, was found to contain boracic acid. In the trade there were two kinds of cream known and sold, preserved cream and cream, and the boracic acid was generally used by the trade as a preservative to keep the cream good. It was found as a fact that cream if mixed with boracic acid equivalent to that found in the cream sold was not injurious to adults, but was injurious to the health of children and invalids, and that this class of cream was given to children. It was held that the preserved cream so sold was not in itself an "article of food", but was an article of food—namely, cream—mixed with an ingredient; that the article so mixed was "injurious to health" within the meaning of s. 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vic., c. 63), although it was not injurious to normal adult persons, and that the seller was guilty of selling an article of food mixed with an ingredient so as to render the article injurious to health.¹²

'Unfit for food or drink.'—According to the plain wording of the section the articles of food or drink may be for human consumption, or for the use of animals. But if the food in question is unfit for men, but fit for animals, and is sold as food for animals, no conviction will lie.¹³

3. 'Knowing or having reason to believe that the same is noxious.'—See s. 26 as to the meaning of the expression 'reason to believe.' A meat salesman can be convicted for knowingly sending or exposing meat for sale in a public market as fit for human food, when it is not.¹⁴

Selling adulterated article as unadulterated.—The sale of adulterated articles of food as pure and unadulterated is not an offence under this section though it may amount to cheating or to an offence under some Municipal Act.¹⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the article is food or drink.

(2) That the accused sold, or offered, or exposed for sale such article.

(3) That at the time it was sold, etc., it had been rendered, or had become noxious, or was in a state unfit for food or drink.

(4) That he at the time knew, or had reason to believe, that the article sold, etc., was noxious, or unfit for food or drink.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Triable summarily.

Order for destruction.—On a conviction the Court may order the food or drink to be destroyed.¹⁶

274. Whoever adulterates¹ any drug or medical preparation in such a manner as to lessen the efficacy or change the operation of such drug or medical preparation, or to make it noxious, intending that it shall be sold or used for, or knowing it to be likely that it will be sold or used for, any medicinal purpose, as if it had not undergone such adulteration, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

To preserve the purity of drugs sold for medicinal purposes this section is enacted.

To support a conviction under this and the following section it is sufficient to show that the efficacy of a drug is lessened, it need not necessarily become noxious to life. Under both these sections mixing water with a drug would be penal, but where a drug loses its efficacy by its being kept, the sections do not apply. A person who sells an inferior quality of a drug cannot be convicted because the word 'adulteration' imports an admixture of some foreign substance.

1. 'Adulterates.'—'Adulterates', that is, apparently mixes with any other substance, whether wholly different, or of the same kind but inferior quality. Mayne, however, thinks that to mix an inferior quality of cod liver oil with a superior quality of that drug would not come under this section, though the efficacy of the drug would be lessened by the mixing.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the article is a drug or medical preparation.

(2) That it was adulterated by the accused.

(3) That such adulteration tended to lessen its efficacy, or to change its operation or to make it noxious.

(4) That the accused intended that such adulterated drug should be sold or used for a medicinal purpose as an unadulterated drug; or knew that it was likely that it would be sold or used for the same.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Triable summarily.

Order for destruction.—On a conviction the Court may order the drug or medical preparation to be destroyed.¹⁷

275. Whoever, knowing any drug or medical preparation to have been adulterated¹ in such a manner as to lessen its efficacy, to change its operation, or to render it noxious, sells² the same, or offers or exposes³ it for sale, or issues it from any dispensary for medicinal purposes as unadulterated, or causes it to be used for medicinal purposes by any person not knowing of the adulteration, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Sale of adulterated drugs.

COMMENT.

The offence under this section consists in selling, or offering, or exposing for sale, or issuing from any dispensary, an adulterated drug as unadulterated. This section bears the same relation to s. 274 as s. 273 bears to s. 272. Section 273 deals with the sale of an article of food or drink that has become noxious. This section not only prohibits its sale but also its issue from any dispensary.

1. 'Knowing any drug or medical preparation to have been adulterated, etc.'—There must be knowledge that the drug or medical preparation has been adulterated in such a manner as to lessen its efficacy or to change its operation or to render it noxious. Upon a complaint, under s. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vic., c. 63), for selling tincture of opium which was not "of the nature, substance, or quality" of the article demanded by the purchaser, it appeared that the drug which was sold as "tincture of opium" by the defendant was deficient in opium to the extent of one-third and in alcohol to the extent of nearly one-half as compared with the standard prescribed by the British Pharmacopœia. It was held that the defendant was liable to be convicted.¹⁸ Similarly it was held where a purchaser asked to be supplied with "mercury ointment", but was given an ointment containing a less proportion of mercury than that prescribed by the Pharmacopœia.¹⁹

2. 'Sells.'—He who sells, whether he be a master or servant, whether he be principal or a person to whom the conduct and management of sales is delegated is struck at by this section.²⁰ But a mere canvasser who gets only commission for receiving orders is not a seller.²¹

3. 'Exposes.'—The drug sold may be in a packet: it is not necessary that it must be actually exposed to view. It is sufficient exposure of the article if the packet containing it is in the shop for sale.²² There is no exposure for sale if the drug is simply stored up in a room or cellar.²³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the drug has been adulterated.

(2) That the adulteration was such as to lessen its efficacy, or change its operation, or render it noxious.

(3) That the accused sold, or offered or exposed, such drug for sale; or that he issued it from a medical dispensary; or that he caused it to be used for a medicinal purpose.

(4) That he sold, or issued such drug as an unadulterated drug; or caused it to be used by a person who did not know of such adulteration.

(5) That he knew that such drug was so adulterated when so sold, etc.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Triable summarily.

Order for destruction.—On a conviction the Court may order the destruction of the drug.²⁴

276. Whoever knowingly sells, or offers or exposes for sale, or issues from a dispensary for medicinal purposes, any drug or medical preparation, as a different drug or medical preparation, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Sale of drug as a different drug or preparation.

COMMENT.

The offence constituted by this section does not involve the idea of any adulteration, or inferiority, in the substituted medicine. It is sufficient that it is not in fact what it purports to be; for instance, supplying saffron instead of saffron.²⁵ If a chemist were to discover a drug which he considered to be just as effective as genuine and which could be procured for half the price, he would not be justified in selling it as genuine even though it answered precisely the same purpose. The fraud consists not in the injury done, but in the false pretence by which persons who suppose that they are using one medicine, are forced to use another against their will.

The difference between this and the two preceding sections is that no adulteration is contemplated or essential for a conviction under this section, while under the former it is.

This section deals with drugs only and not with articles of food or drink.

(2) That it was so sold, etc., by him, as a drug or medical preparation different from what it is.

(3) That he knew of such difference at the time it was so sold, etc.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Triable summarily.

277. Whoever voluntarily corrupts or fouls¹ the water of any public spring or reservoir,² so as to render it less fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Fouling water of public spring or reservoir.

COMMENT.

The water of a public spring or reservoir belongs to every member of the public in common, and, if a person voluntarily fouls it, he commits public nuisance.

Ingredients.—The section requires (1) voluntary corruption or fouling of water; (2) the water must be of a public spring or reservoir; and (3) the water must be rendered less fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used.

1. 'Voluntarily corrupts or fouls.'—See s. 39, supra. The purpose for which the water is ordinarily used must be considered in determining whether there has been a voluntary corrupting within the meaning of this section.

'Corrupts or fouls'—The words "corrupts or fouls" mean some act which physically defiles or fouls the water.¹ Bathing in a tank² or spitting into a public well³ fouls drinking water. But angling with an unfoul bait does not.⁴ Fishing with basket-nets in a tank, the water of which was used for drinking purposes, the use of the baskets having caused a slight disturbance of the mud and so rendered the water rather less fit than usual for drinking;⁵ and cultivating paddy in the bed of a tank, the water of which was used as of right by the public for drinking purposes,⁶ were held to be offences under this section. The act of a woman of a lower caste taking water from public cisterns of water does not amount to corrupting or fouling.⁷ Similarly, a person of a low caste drawing water from a public well cannot be said to corrupt or foul the well.⁸

2. 'Public spring or reservoir.'—These words do not include a public river.⁹ The word 'public' is nowhere defined. But a 'public place' is a place where the public go, no matter whether they have a right to go or not.¹⁰ Similarly a public spring will be a spring used by the public whether rightly or not. The strewing of branches in a river for fishing purposes was held, therefore, to be no offence under this section.¹¹

The words 'public spring' do not include a continuous stream of water running along the bed of a river;¹² nor the water of a rivulet standing in pools from which water is drawn for drinking purposes;¹³ nor the water of a nullah.¹⁴ Where a dog-killer buried the carcass of a dog in the bed of a public river near a town, it was held that a conviction under this section could not be sustained, although there was evidence that the people of the vicinity bathed in, and drank water from, the river and also used for domestic purposes water taken from the river in the bed of which the carcass was buried, because the section applied to corrupting the water of a spring or reservoir.¹⁵

In an indictment against a gas company for a nuisance, in conveying the refuse of gas into a great public river, whereby the fish were destroyed, and the water was rendered unfit for drinking, etc., it was held that the circumstance that by the diminution of fish, a considerable number of fishermen were thrown out of employ, was not of itself sufficient ground to sustain such indictment.¹⁶

3. 'So as to render it less fit...used.'—The water must have been rendered less fit for the purposes for which it is ordinarily used.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the spring or reservoir is public.

(2) That the accused caused the water thereof to become corrupt or foul.

(3) That he did so voluntarily.

(4) That such corrupting or fouling rendered the same less fit for use than it ordinarily was before the accused did as above.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

278. Whoever voluntarily vitiates the atmosphere¹ in any place so as to make it noxious to the health of persons in general dwelling or carrying on business in the neighbourhood or passing along a public way, shall be punished with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees.

Making atmosphere noxious to health.

COMMENT.

Prosecutions against offensive trades which give out bad smells will come under this section. As the contamination of atmosphere affects the people living in the neighbourhood, this section is not so general as the last one which deals with the fouling of the water of a stream or reservoir. This section and s. 336 provide punishment for similar acts causing danger to human life and personal safety. It is not essential under either of them that hurt be actually caused.

Scope.—The section is directed against a public nuisance and not a private nuisance. Where the accused threw a human skull which was in a highly offensive condition into the house of the complainant, but there was nothing to show that the atmosphere was made noxious to the other persons dwelling in the locality, it was held that he was not guilty of an offence under this section though his conduct was most reprehensible and offensive.¹⁷

1. 'Voluntarily vitiates the atmosphere.'—See s. 39, supra, as to the meaning of the word 'voluntarily.' The act done must be noxious to the health of persons in general dwelling or carrying on business in the neighbourhood. It is not necessary that the alleged nuisance should produce smells injurious to health; it is sufficient if they be offensive to the senses. Thus, allowing a large stock of bones to remain uncovered in the open for a long time so as to become rotten and to emit a smell noxious to people living in or passing by the vicinity is a public nuisance.¹⁸

Offices of nature.—The act of performing the offices of nature in a public street is not an offence under this section.¹⁹ No reasons are given for this decision, but it seems that a mere solitary act like this is not likely to vitiate the atmosphere.

English cases.—Making acid spirit of sulphur, and thereby impregnating the air with offensive smells,²⁰ and steeping hides near a highway,²¹ are held to be public nuisances.

(2) That he did so voluntarily.

(3) That such vitiation was in its nature noxious to health.

(4) That it was noxious to the health of persons dwelling or carrying on business in the neighbourhood of the place, or passing along a public way.

279. Whoever drives any vehicle, or rides, on any public way¹ in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person,² shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.*

COMMENT.

Under this section the effect of driving or riding must be either that human life was in fact endangered or that hurt or injury was likely to be caused.

Ingredients.—The section requires two essentials :—

1. Driving of a vehicle, or riding on a public way.

2. Such driving or riding must be so rash or negligent as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person.

1. 'Drives any vehicle, or rides, on any public way.'—"If a man is driving along a road, it is his duty not to do that which may injure another person whom he meets on the road, or to his horse or his carriage... If a man is driving on Salisbury Plain, and no other person is near him, he is at liberty to drive as fast and as recklessly as he pleases. But if he sees another carriage coming near to him, immediately a duty arises not to drive in such a way as is likely to cause an injury to that other carriage. So, too, if a man is driving along a street in a town, a similar duty not to drive carelessly arises out of contiguity or neighbourhood".²² If a man drives at an unusually rapid pace he will be liable for injury caused thereby, although he calls out to the person injured to get out of the way in time. The fact that streets are unusually crowded from any public procession, or other cause, instead of excusing a driver when proceeding at his ordinary pace and with ordinary care, requires him to be particularly cautious, and may tend to render him criminally answerable for any accidents ensuing from driving at a rate, and with those precautions, which he might have ordinarily observed.²³

A person driving a carriage is not bound to keep on the regular side of the road; but if he does not, he must use more care, and keep a better look-out, to avoid concussion, than would be necessary if he were on the proper part of the road.²⁴ He must satisfy the Court that he was not rash or negligent in driving on the wrong side.²⁵ It is not always rash and negligent to drive on the wrong side of the road. Much would

* In Burma the following section is added by Burma Act VI of 1941, s. 1 :

279 A. Whoever throws or causes to fall or strike at, against into or upon any vehicle in a public place, any wood, stone, acid or other matter or thing, with intent or knowledge that he is likely to endanger the safety of any person being in or upon such vehicle, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to rupees five hundred, or with both.

Explanation (1).—For the purpose of this section, "vehicle" means a wheeled conveyance capable of being used in a street.

Explanation (2).—It is not an offence punishable under this section to throw water at any vehicle in a public place during the Thingyan Festival.

Explanation (3).—Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to prevent any person from being prosecuted under other section of this Code or under any other law, for any act or omission.

depend upon other conditions.¹ If he was negligent he would be liable.² In cases of negligent driving, the law or usage of the road is not the criterion of negligence. Therefore, where defendant's carriage was on the wrong side of the road, and in attempting to pass on the near instead of the off side, plaintiff sustained damages, it was held that it was for the jury to decide the question of negligence, without regard to the law of the road.³ Drivers of motor cars should not attempt to pass a car in front of them by going on to the wrong side of the road unless they can see the road in front is so absolutely clear of traffic coming from the opposite direction that they can get back again on to the proper side of the road without any risk of accident. It is only when the road is so clear that there can be no possible chance of an accident that any attempt may be made to pass the car in front of the driver.⁴ Where the accused, while driving a motor car on the wrong side of the road at a blind corner between two roads of considerable traffic, came in collision with a motor bicycle and caused damage to the side car of the bicycle, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.⁵

A person driving a car must keep it in a state of control sufficient to enable him to avoid running into any passenger who may fail to step off the road.⁶

Furious driving.—The accused was in charge of a horse and trap, of which trap he was the sole occupant. He was asleep in the trap, and the horse proceeded through a village at a furious pace. A police constable attempted to stop the vehicle, but failed to do so. It was held that the accused was the driver of the vehicle, though asleep and was guilty of driving a carriage at a furious pace so as to endanger the life or limb of a passenger who in this case was the constable on duty.⁷

On a straight and open road a speed of thirty miles cannot necessarily and of itself be described as an excessive and rash speed.⁸

Driving bullocks without nose-strings.—A person driving a cart, the bullocks of which have no nose-strings, is not guilty of rash driving under this section.⁹

'Rides.'—If the accused was riding rashly or negligently, without exercising that care for the safety of others which a prudent man might reasonably be expected to exercise, he would be guilty under this section. If he was riding so fast that he would be unable to stop the horse if a foot-passenger got in the way, he would be liable, provided the foot-passenger acted in a reasonable manner.¹⁰

'Public way.'—Any way which is common to all subjects, whether directly leading to a town, or beyond a town as a thoroughfare to other towns, or from town to town, may properly be called a public way.¹¹ There must be a definite enduring track-way in some particular direction. Merely temporary and transitory tracks not passable in all seasons cannot be regarded as public ways.¹²

2. 'So rash or negligent as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person.'—"A rash act is primarily an over-hasty act and is thus opposed to a deliberate act, but it also includes an act which, though it may be said to be deliberate, is yet done without due deliberation and caution"¹³ The most formally scientific analysis of negligence is that of Austin.¹⁴ He draws a distinction between negligence, heedlessness, and rashness, which, though closely allied, "are broadly distinguished by differences."

"In cases of Negligence, the party performs not an act to which he is obliged. He breaks a positive duty.

In cases of Heedlessness or Rashness, the party does an act from which he is bound to forbear. He breaks a negative duty.

In cases of Negligence, he adverts not to the act, which it is his duty to do.

In cases of Heedlessness, he adverts not to consequences of the act which he does.

In cases of Rashness, he adverts to those consequences of the act; but, by reason of some assumption which he examines insufficiently, he concludes that those consequences will not follow the act in the instance before him."

'Negligence' has been defined to be the breach of a duty caused by the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do.¹⁵

'Negligence'...[is not] an affirmative word...it is a negative word; it is the absence of such care, skill and diligence as it was the duty of the person to bring to the performance of the work which he is said not to have performed.¹⁶

Culpable rashness is acting with the consciousness that the mischievous and illegal consequences may follow, but with the hope that they will not, and often with the belief that the actor has taken sufficient precautions to prevent their happening. The imputability arises from acting despite the consciousness. Culpable negligence is acting without the consciousness that the illegal and mischievous effect will follow but in circumstances which show that the actor has not exercised the caution incumbent upon him, and that, if he had he would have had the consciousness. The imputability arises from the neglect of the civic duty of circumspection.¹⁷

An injury shall be deemed to be negligently caused whensoever it is not wilfully caused, but results from want of reasonable caution, in the undertaking and doing of any act either without such skill, knowledge or ability as is suitable to the occasion, or without due care taken to ascertain the nature and probable consequences of such act; or when it results from the not exercising reasonable caution in the doing of any act, either as regards the means used or the manner of using them, or from the doing of any act without using reasonable caution for the prevention of mischief, or from the omitting to do any act which a person using reasonable caution would not have omitted to do.¹⁸ When 'negligently' is a part of the definition of an offence, it implies that the act constituting the offence shall have been done, or caused, by the alleged offender himself, proof that it was done by the alleged offender's servant, without more, will not bring the charge home.¹⁹

Criminal negligence or criminal rashness is an important element in offences punishable under ss. 279, 280, 284-289, 304A, 336-338.

'Endanger human life.'—It is not necessary that the rash or negligent act should result in injury to life or property.²⁰ It is not necessary to prove that any person was on the road, at the time, and the Court may take into consideration the probability of persons using it being placed in danger.²¹ No rider or driver can tell when a pedestrian may happen to arrive on a road, consequently he cannot drive or ride rashly or negligently even at a time when the road happens to be temporarily unoccupied by any pedestrian or by any vehicle. And this is so not only because any person or any vehicle may happen to arrive on the road at any time, but also because the driver or the rider is to look to his own safety as well and cannot at all indulge in a riding or driving which may endanger his own life.²² The mere fact that a public road happens, at the moment, to be empty is not per se a ground for acquitting a person of the offence under this section, for his rash driving or riding in such public road is likely to cause injury to human life, even though in point of fact he had, by the intervention of Providence, not endangered the safety of any person.²³ Supposing that a person driving a vehicle in a crowded thoroughfare urges the horses to such speed that it is impossible for him to stop their course suddenly, and that a passenger is knocked down by them and killed on the spot, the driver would be found guilty of culpable homicide. Now if the passenger was just saved by the timely effort of another person pulling him out of the way, would not a want of due regard for human life on the part of the driver be, as justly inferred from the manner of his driving, proved as we may assume by the evidence of those two persons, the one who had been in imminent peril of his life and the other who happily saved him, as if the result had been a fatal accident? The want of due regard for human life upon which the criminality depends is a matter of inference from the circumstances, and wherever the circumstances proved are such that if loss of life had ensued the party committing the act would be answerable for it criminally, the same circumstances will sufficiently warrant a conviction of the simple offence where no injury has resulted.

There can be no civil action for negligence if the negligent act or omission has not been attended by any injury to any person, but bare negligence involving the risk of injury is punishable criminally, though nobody is actually hurt by it.

If actual hurt is caused the case would come under s. 337 or 338; and if death is caused, under s. 302 or 304A. It is the rash or negligent manner of driving or riding which constitutes an offence under this section. Where the accused, a motor driver, runs over and kills a woman but there is no rashness or negligence on the part of the driver so far as his use of the road or manner of driving is concerned, the accused cannot be convicted under s. 304A on the ground that the brakes of the lorry were not in perfect order and that the lorry carried no horn. The "rash or negligent act" referred to in that section means the act which is the immediate cause of death and not any act or omission which can at most be said to be a remote cause of death.²⁴

Under ss. 279, 280, 282 and 284-289 the offences against public safety are completed although the rash or negligent act results in no injury to life or property. The car of a Pork Inspector of a Municipal Corporation was chasing another car containing illicit pork. Both the cars were being driven so rashly and at such a dangerous speed as to alarm the people passing on the roads some of whom narrowly escaped being knocked down and run over. Both the cars ignored the traffic signals and crossed the junction when the signal was against them. The Pork Inspector had asked his driver to keep the chased car in sight but there was no evidence that he induced the driver to drive so rashly. The car containing illicit pork ultimately crashed but the chasing car stopped at about a distance of 100 feet from the chased car. The driver of the chasing car was convicted under this section and sentenced to six months' rigorous imprisonment and the Pork Inspector was convicted for abetment under s. 279/114. It was held that the driver was rightly convicted under this section, that although he drove at such an inordinate pace, his car was not completely out of his control, and he always had the leading car acting as a kind of pilot, and that he would always have more time than the man in front to pull up and avoid an accident. The sentence was therefore reduced to one of fine of Rs. 100.²⁵ It is a negligent act to carry any second person, whatever his age, build or weight, on a bicycle, who is liable to change his position or fall off, if this is done on a public way where there is other traffic. Such an act is likely to cause injury to others.¹

'Hurt.'—See s. 319, infra. Where a foot passenger was injured owing to the rash and negligent driving on not a narrow road, there being ample space for the driver to have passed the passenger, and after having knocked him down left him where he was, it was held that the driver was guilty of a serious offence punishable under this section and s. 337.²

'Injury.'—See s. 44, supra.

'Any other person.'—These words are very wide, and are not distinctly limited to persons on a road as distinct from the occupants of the particular vehicle which is being rashly or negligently driven. They are wide enough to include the occupants of the vehicle itself who have as much right to be protected against rash and negligent driving on the part of the driver as have other people on the road.³

Abetment.—When a person in charge of a motor vehicle places it under the control of another with the actual knowledge that such person has no licence to drive and constructive knowledge that he was not trained to drive any motor vehicle is guilty of abetment of the offence of rash and negligent driving if such offence is committed by the person driving the vehicle while the person in charge of the vehicle, sitting by his side, could have prevented the accident.⁴

Liability of master for rash driving of his servant.—In case of collision or injury arising out of rash driving the actual driver and not the owner of the carriage is liable under this section;⁵ whereas in a civil suit the injured party has an option to sue any of them. In a criminal case every man is responsible for his own act; there must therefore be some personal act.⁶ From the mere fact that the occupant of a car does not insist on the driver's driving at a moderate pace, it cannot be presumed that he instigated the driver to drive at a reckless pace.⁷

Contributory negligence.—The doctrine of contributory negligence does not apply in criminal actions.⁸ The accused will be liable even though there has been a degree of negligence on the part of the prosecutor which would incapacitate him from bringing a civil suit. While contributory negligence would not be a defence entitling the accused to an acquittal, it might be a factor for consideration in determining the sentence.⁹

There is a duty on every user of the road to make a reasonable use of it for the purposes of passing along it, and to allow others to do so also. Motorists are not the only persons who owe a duty of care. Others also have a responsibility and must conform to the ordinary usages of the road. In cases of negligence the law or usage of the road is not the criterion of negligence. The test is whether the accident could have been avoided by the accused if he had exercised that care and diligence which ordinarily cautious persons using the road in similar circumstances would have done.¹⁰

The accused was on the wrong side of the road, but he took all possible precautions by driving his car slowly and by putting his hand up to give his signal to the complainant when he saw the complainant's car coming on from the opposite direction at an excessive speed; but in spite of all this, the accident occurred. This accident would not have occurred if the complainant had not been driving his car at an excessive speed. It was held that the accused was not guilty of negligence.¹¹

Joint liability.—A motor car, which had been left unattended in a street, was removed by two persons without the knowledge and assent of the owner, but without felonious intent on the part of either person, and for the purpose of a "joy-ride". Subsequently an old woman was knocked down by the car and died as the result of her injuries. The accused was at the time riding as a passenger in the car, and there was no evidence that he had at any time taken any part in the driving, nor was there any evidence of how the car was being driven prior to the collision; but there was evidence that, at the time of the collision, which was long after dark, the car was being driven at a very fast speed, without sufficient lights, and that, although the brakes were violently applied, it did not stop before it had travelled some thirty yards from the place of impact. The jury convicted both the driver and the passenger of manslaughter. It was held that the jury was entitled to draw the inference that a common purpose to drive the car in a criminally negligent manner existed between the driver and passenger, and the passenger, as well as the driver, was properly convicted.¹²

Special statute.—Where there is a special statute, such as the Bombay Motor Vehicles Act (Bom. Act II of 1904), which penalises the rash driving of a motor, the punishment should be under such statute.¹³ The accused cannot be prosecuted under this section when once he is convicted under the Motor Vehicles Act for rash driving, but he can be prosecuted under s. 338 of the Penal Code for the consequences of such rash driving.¹⁴

The accused cannot be convicted under this section as well as s. 338.¹⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was driving a vehicle or that he was riding.

(2) That it was a public way on which he was driving or riding.

(3) That he was driving or riding in a rash or negligent manner.¹⁶

Negligence cannot be inferred from the mere fact of a person having been run over.¹⁷

(4) That the driving or riding was such as to endanger human life, or was such as to be likely to cause hurt or injury.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

280. Whoever navigates any vessel¹ in a manner so rash or negligent² as to endanger human life,³ or to be likely to cause hurt⁴ or injury⁵ to any other person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

The same rules apply to navigation on a river as on a highway, and persons, who navigate a river improperly either by too much speed or by negligent conduct, are as much liable as if the accident occurred on a public highway either by furious driving or negligent conduct.

This section therefore is analogous to the preceding section. Section 279, however, applies only in the case of a 'public' road, whereas this section is not limited to public navigable waters, but would also include waterways in private property.

Scope.—This section deals with the case of inland navigation. Rash and negligent navigation on the high seas will not be punished under the Code. The Indian Merchant Shipping Act,¹⁸ the Pilgrim Ships Act,¹⁹ and the Native Passengers Ships Act²⁰ deal with the safety of passengers on the high seas.

1. 'Vessel.'—See s. 48, supra.

2. 'Rash or negligent.'—See Comment on s. 279, supra. The negligence to render the defendant liable must be the causa causans, or the proximate cause of the injury, and not merely a causa sine qua non.²¹ The immediate cause of the accident should be rashness or negligence on the part of the navigator. In considering the question of degree, the question of contributory negligence has also to be taken into account not as a defence to the indictment, but for the purpose of determining causations and fixing a measure of the liability of the navigator. Where the navigator does some act which causes the accident, he will be guilty of the offence under this section, but a mere omission on his part in not doing the whole of his duty is not sufficient to make him guilty. Where the accused navigator did all he could to save the situation but could not avoid the collision, he was held to be not guilty.²² It is the primary duty of steam vessels to keep out of the way of vessels lying at anchor. The fact that a launch runs into a cargo boat at anchor is in itself prima facie evidence of negligent navigation.²³ Where a ferry-boat contractor was convicted under this section and s. 109 of abetting the rash navigation of a vessel, on the evidence that the boat hired by him in fulfilment of the contract was upset through not containing sufficient ballast, it was held that there was no evidence to show that the contractor intentionally omitted to provide the ferry-boat with what he knew to be necessary for safe navigation, and that the conviction, therefore, could not be supported.²⁴

To make the captain of a steam vessel guilty of manslaughter, in causing a person to be drowned, by running down a boat, the prosecutor must show some act done by the captain; and a mere omission, on his part, in not doing the whole of his duty, is not sufficient. But, if there be sufficient light, and the captain of a steamer is either at the helm, or in a situation to be giving the command, and does that which causes the injury, he is guilty of manslaughter.²⁵

Where a vessel is sunk by unavoidable accident in a public navigable river, whether in the usual track of navigation or not, it is the duty of the owner, so long as he continues to have the possession and control of the vessel, to take due precaution to prevent injury to other vessels by their striking against; and this obligation may be transferred with the transfer of possession and control to another person; and, on the abandonment of possession and control, the obligation ceases.¹

4. 'Hurt.'—See s. 319, infra. 5. 'Injury.'—See s. 44, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that it was a vessel which was being navigated.

(2) That the accused was navigating the same.

(3) That he was doing so in a rash or negligent manner.

(4) That the navigation was such as to endanger human life, or was such as to be likely to cause hurt or injury.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Summary trial.

281. Whoever exhibits any false light, mark or buoy, intending or knowing it to be likely that such exhibition will mislead any navigator, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

Intentional exhibition of false light, mark or buoy with a view to mislead any navigator is punishable under this section. If the act is not intentional but due to negligence then this section will not apply.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused exhibited the light, mark or buoy in question.

(2) That such light, mark or buoy was false.

(3) That the accused did as in (1), intending, or knowing that such false exhibition would be likely to mislead any navigator.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, did exhibit a false light (or mark or buoy) when a certain vessel called——(if the name of the vessel is known it should be specified) was sailing (specify the place)—— knowing or intending it to be likely that the exhibition of the said false light (or mark or buoy) would mislead the officer in charge of the navigation of the said vessel; and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 281 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Conveying person by water for hire in unsafe or overloaded vessel.

vessel, when that vessel is in such a state or so loaded as to endanger the life of that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section provides against the negligence of carriers by water; whereas no specific provision is made for the negligence of carriers by land. Boatmen plying for hire on rivers, at ferries, etc., whose boats are overloaded, or are not in a fit condition safely to carry passengers, are criminally responsible for their neglect. Under this section no liability will attach to the owner if the ship sinks with her crew and the captain only; but it will afford no protection if a single passenger goes to the bottom, though he may have been carried gratuitously.

Object.—The motive for specifically providing for the case of a common carrier by water is that he exercises an employment affecting the public in general, and the probable consequences of negligence in carrying by water are much more serious than they ordinarily are in carrying by land.

1. 'Knowingly or negligently conveys, or causes to be conveyed, etc.'—

The word 'knowingly' has here a significance similar to 'rashly'. Criminal negligence is gross and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care to guard against injury either to the public in general or to the individual in particular, which, having regard to the circumstances, it was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted.² Where a person with the assistance of two others plied a ferry-boat, which was out of order, and had a crack, and he took in one hundred passengers, and as a consequence the boat was upset, and seven persons were drowned, it was held that he should be convicted under this section.³ Certain persons whom the accused, a ferryman, was rowing across a river, were drowned by the sinking of the boat which was an old one, with some holes in the bottom, over which planks had been nailed. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section.⁴ Where the lessee of a public ferry knew that boats were usually overloaded but took no steps against it and allowed his boatmen to overload them as they liked and in consequence a boat sank with some passengers, it was held that the lessee was guilty of criminal negligence and liable under this section.⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused conveyed a person for hire, or caused the same to be done.

(2) That the mode of conveying that person was, in a vessel, by water.

(3) That such vessel at the time was in such a state, or so loaded, as to be dangerous to the life of that person.

(4) That when such person was thus conveyed, the accused acted negligently or with a knowledge of the state of such vessel.

Danger or obstruction in public way or line of navigation.

COMMENT.

This section refers to parties who do acts so as to cause danger, obstruction or injury to any person in any public way,⁶ or public line of navigation. It does not refer either to a public nuisance or to the intention of the accused. A public nuisance may be caused without any deliberate intention of causing it. The obstruction may be caused by negligence and in nine cases out of ten it is so caused.⁷

Every man is so bound to use his property as not to injure others. Holt, C. J., laid down the strict principle of law—sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas (every one must so use his own as not to do damage to another). The offence punishable by this section is the nuisance of causing obstruction, etc., in a public way or navigable river or canal.

All injuries to a public way, as by digging a ditch or making a hedge across it or laying logs of timber in it, or ploughing it up, or by doing any other act which will render it less commodious to the public, will be punishable under this section.

Ingredients.—The section requires two essentials :—

1. A person must do an act or omit to take order with any property in his possession or under his charge.

2. Such act or omission must cause danger, obstruction or injury to any person in any public way or line of navigation.

1. 'By doing any act, or by omitting to take order with any property in his possession, etc.'—Here the word 'act' is contrasted with 'omitting' though it includes omission. See s. 32, supra.

'To take order.'—That is, to dispose of the property in one's possession or charge in such a way as to prevent danger, obstruction, or injury. The defendant was the owner and occupier of a vacant piece of land. He had surrounded it by a hoarding, but people threw filth and refuse over, and broke up the hoarding, so that the condition of the land and the use to which it was put constituted a public nuisance. It was held that it was a common law duty of the owner of the piece of land to prevent it from being so used as to be a public nuisance.⁸ Where obstruction was caused to a public way by the erection of a hut and not by the exposing of goods for sale in the said hut by the accused, who had rented it from the person who had raised the hut, it was held that the accused could not be convicted of an offence under this section.⁹

'Property.'—See s. 22, supra. 'Possession.'—See s. 27, supra.

2. 'Causes danger, obstruction or injury to any person in any public way or public line of navigation.'—Every unauthorized obstruction of a highway to the annoyance of the King's subjects is an indictable offence. Thus, it is an offence for stage coaches to stand plying for passengers in public streets.¹⁰ A permanent obstruction on a highway, erected and placed there without lawful authority, which renders the way less commodious to the public, is an unlawful act and a public nuisance although it be not placed upon the hard or metalled part of the highway or upon a foot-path artificially formed upon it, and although sufficient space for the public traffic remains.¹¹

Under this section it must be established that the act of the accused had caused 'danger, obstruction, or injury' to any particular person or class of persons.¹² Thus, the spreading of fishing nets by the side of a thoroughfare in a town, when it did not cause obstruction to any particular person or persons, was held to be no offence.¹³ Where the danger or obstruction is not caused to any particular person the person obstructing would be guilty under s. 290 and not under this section.¹⁴ But in a later case the same High Court has held that where the evidence showed that an obstruction placed on a road must necessarily prevent vehicles from passing at all and foot-passengers from passing without inconvenience, it was a necessary inference that persons were obstructed and that it was not necessary to expressly prove that any specific individual was actually obstructed.¹⁵

Where the accused allowed a prickly-pear fence, which formed a boundary between accused's yard and the road, to extend itself over a part of the road, and an obstruction of the road was thereby caused, it was held that his act was punishable. The Court said: "Prickly-pear is a plant which naturally extends itself very rapidly; and it is the duty of those who use it as a hedge by the side of a public road to take care that the road is not obstructed by its growth."¹⁶ The accused, who had a toy shop, exhibited in the windows of their shop, overlooking a public road, certain clock-work toys during the Divali festival. A large crowd of people collected on the road to witness the toys, in consequence of which there were dangerous rushes, several persons were knocked down and great obstruction and danger were caused to those using the road. The accused were asked by the police to stop the exhibition but they did not obey. On these facts, the Magistrate convicted the accused of offences under this section and s. 114. It was held that there was obstruction, danger and injury to the persons using the public way, which amounted to a public nuisance, and that the efficient cause of the nuisance was the act of the accused, inasmuch as in working the toys in the manner they did, their object was to attract a crowd, and as they knew that a crowd would be attracted by what they did, they must be regarded as having intended that consequence.¹⁷

'Public way.'—See s. 279, supra. Where the privilege of a way¹⁸ is enjoyed only by a particular section of the community or by the inhabitants of two or three villages and not by others, the way is not a public way within the meaning of this section.¹⁸ A pathway which lies over private land and which is used by the villagers and perhaps by the inhabitants of some other villages also, but with regard to which there is no evidence of such universal user as to raise an inference of dedication to the public in general, is not a public way such as is contemplated by this section. There can be a dedication to the public for a limited purpose, e.g. access to a particular building, and consequently a pathway that does not join a public thoroughfare at either end does not militate against its public character.¹⁹ Where a cart-track lay in the private land of the accused who had put up a wall across it and claimed a right to close, it was held that they could not be convicted under this section.²⁰

Ways permitted to be used by a section of the public are private ways, generally having their origin in custom, but such ways can be converted into ordinary highways after user by the public sufficient to raise a presumption of dedication to the public in general. Evidence in support of public claim must be cogent.

An encroachment made by an adjacent land-owner on the space occupied by the highway cannot be legalised by possession for any length of time. The public have the right to the free use of any portion of the highway.²¹

'Public line of navigation.'—An owner of land at the side of a public navigable river has no right to erect on the bed of the river, for the benefit of his own trade, any structure, whether any actual obstruction to the navigation of the river will or will not thereby be occasioned; and any benefit to his own trade is too remote to be held for the advantage of the public generally, and so to justify the erection.²² On the trial for an indictment for a nuisance in a navigable river and common King's highway called the harbour of C, by erecting of an embankment in the waterway, was held to be a public nuisance although the inconvenience was counterbalanced by the public benefit in some other way.²³

English cases.—A wagoner occupying one side of a public street in a city, before his warehouses, in loading and unloading his wagons for several hours at a time both day and night, kept one wagon at least usually standing before his warehouses, so that no carriage could pass on that side of the street, was held guilty of nuisance.²⁴ Where a person, having a house in a street, exhibited effigies at his windows and thereby attracted a crowd to look at them which caused the footway to be obstructed, so that the public could not pass as they ought to do, it was held that he was guilty of nuisance.²⁵ Where a person removed the pavement and dug trenches in the roadway and footway of a public thoroughfare in order to lay down service pipes for the supply of gas from mains to private houses, it was held that this was not a temporary obstruction of the highway as might be necessarily incidental to the enjoyment of his property.¹ Where the accused, for the purposes of profit to themselves, placed telegraph posts upon a highway, and did permanently keep them there, such posts being of such sizes and dimensions as to obstruct and prevent the passage of carriages and horses or foot-passengers, it was held that the accused were liable for nuisance.² The accused in the night time altered the position of two arms of a semaphore signal on a railway station, so as to change the signal from "all clear" to "danger" and "caution", respectively, and also altered the colour of two distant signals on the line from white to red, thereby changing the signal from "clear" to "danger." The alteration caused a train, which would have passed the station without slackening speed, to slacken speed, and to come nearly to a stand. Another train going in the same direction, and on the same rails, was due at the station in half an hour. It was held that the accused had obstructed a train.³ A person improperly went on a line of railway, and purposely attempted to stop a train approaching by placing himself on the space between two lines of rails, and holding up his arms in the mode adopted by the inspector of the line when desirous of stopping a train. The driver was thereupon induced to diminish the speed from twenty to four miles per hour. It was held that this amounted to an obstruction.⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused the danger, obstruction⁵ or injury in question.

(2) That the same was caused by his act, or omission, to take order with property in his possession or under his charge.

(3) That the person put in danger, or obstructed, or injured, was then in a public way or public line of navigation.

shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

Under this section "a person in possession of a poisonous substance should have negligently omitted to take such order with it as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from such substance. The gist of the offence is culpable negligence. The fact that a person has the custody of any dangerous substance, suffices itself to impose upon him the duty of being careful : and he is criminally responsible if he negligently omits to take such order with the substance as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger from such substance to human life, whether the substance be poison, or fire, or a combustible or explosive substance or machinery... it is not necessary, to constitute an offence under that section, that the negligent omission punishable under it should be followed by any disastrous consequences."⁸

This section proceeds on the principle that carelessness, when sufficient in degree, is to be regarded as criminal notwithstanding that it may not have occasioned hurt.

Where the accused, a sergeant in the police, took over a desk containing poisonous powders and other powders, which might easily be mistaken one for the other, without taking any precaution whatever to guard against misuse of the poison, and the only order he took with the poison subsequently was to hand over the key of the receptacle in which the powders were kept, to a subordinate official, who by mistake issued some of the poisonous powders to a Deputy Inspector suffering from fever, who took one of the powders and died, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section.⁷

7. 'Possession.'—See s. 27, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the substance in question is poisonous, and if taken, would be dangerous to life, or likely to cause hurt or injury.

(2) That the accused did an act therewith, which endangered, or was likely to endanger, human life or was likely to cause hurt or injury.

(3) That he did such act rashly or negligently.

Or prove (1) as above, and further—

(2) That the accused was in possession of such substance.

(3) That he omitted to take such order therewith, as was sufficient to guard against a probable danger to human life therefrom.

(4) That such omission was negligent, or with a knowledge of such probable danger.

COMMENT.

This section further extends the provisions of the preceding section.

1. 'Act.'—See s. 32, supra.

2. 'Rashly or negligently.'—See s. 279, supra. The section is not applicable where the act of the accused is wilful and not rash or negligent. The accused had a quarrel with his wife about some rice. He got angry, broke the crockery, and then went out and set fire to the eaves of his house, thereby causing risk of injury to house-owners in the neighbourhood but doing no actual mischief. It was held that this section was not applicable as the accused's act was wilful and not rash or negligent.⁸ The owner of a house in which a fire breaks out cannot be convicted under this section, without proof of actual carelessness or an illegal omission from which rashness or negligence can be inferred.⁹

3. 'Endanger human life.'—See s. 279, supra.

4. 'Hurt.'—See s. 319, infra.

5. 'Injury.'—This word includes any harm illegally caused to the property of any other person, and is not confined to injury to the person only. While a marriage procession was going on, the accused, who was one of the procession, used fireworks on the road, which burnt two bundles of straw with which a mandap (a temporary structure) belonging to the complainant was thatched, thereby causing him an injury. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section.¹⁰ The accused was similarly convicted of negligent conduct with respect to fire or combustible matter, in that he was found smoking a bidi (cigarette) close to half-pressed cotton bales lying close to the press-house in the compound of a company.¹¹ See s. 44, supra.

6. 'Knowingly or negligently.'—See s. 286, infra.

7. 'Take such order.'—See s. 283, supra.

8. 'Possession.'—See s. 27, supra.

CASES.

Fire balloons.—Letting off fire ballons is no offence.¹²

English cases.—Keeping great quantities of gunpowder so as to endanger the safety of houses in the vicinity,¹³ or keeping of a dangerous, ignitable and explosive fluid called naphtha near dwelling-houses,¹⁴ amounts to nuisance.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused did an act that endangered, or was likely to endanger, life, or was likely to cause hurt or injury.

(2) That such act was done with fire or some combustible matter.

(3) That such act was done rashly or negligently.

Or prove (1) that the accused had in his possession some fire or combustible matter.

Preventive powers.—See ss. 133 and 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

286. Whoever does, with any explosive substance,¹ any act so rashly or negligently² as to endanger human life,³ or to be likely to cause hurt⁴ or injury⁵ to any other person, or knowingly or negligently⁶ omits to take such order⁷ with any explosive substance in his possession⁸ as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from that substance, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

The last section deals with 'fire or combustible matter', this section, with 'explosive substance', otherwise the provisions of both the sections are alike.

Scope.—The first part of this section is not confined to cases where the explosive substance is in the possession of the accused at the time of the injury but it also applies to a case where the injury takes place after it has left his possession and is being conveyed to its destination.¹⁶

1. 'Explosive substance'.—No definition of this expression occurs in the Code, but under the Explosive Substances Act, 1908, this expression is "deemed to include any materials for making any explosive substance; also any apparatus, machine, implement or material used, or intended to be used, or adapted for causing, or aiding in causing, any explosion in or with any explosive substance; also any part of any such apparatus, machine or implement".¹⁷

Revolver not an explosive substance.—An Assistant Collector left a loaded six-chambered revolver upon his office-box on the platform of a railway station while he went into the station-master's room to change his clothes. His peon took up the revolver and apparently not knowing to handle it, one chamber went off wounding a police constable, who was standing near, in the eye. It was held that the peon could not be convicted, under this section, as a 'revolver' was not an 'explosive substance', though had rashness or negligence on the part of the peon been shown, he would have been guilty under s. 337.¹⁸

2. 'Rashly or negligently'.—See s. 279, supra.

3. 'Endanger human life'.—See s. 279, supra. The substance must be of such a nature and kept in such large quantities and under such local circumstances as to create real danger to life and property. A well-founded apprehension of danger, which would alarm a man of steady nerves and reasonable courage passing through the street in which the house stands, or residing in adjoining houses, is enough to show that something has been done which the law ought to prevent.¹⁹ The accused, having returned to his house after dawn from watching his crops at night with a loaded gun, and finding his house-door locked placed the gun loaded, with the hammer down on the cap, on a cot outside his house, and went for a short time to a neighbouring house. In his absence the child of a neighbour came to the cot and began playing with the gun, which went off and killed the child. It was held that he could not be convicted under this section as it could not be said that the accused must have known, or ought to have considered it to be probable, that a child or children would be likely to be playing about in that place, and that it or they would be likely to handle or play with the gun, and that the danger which actually occurred was not such a probable danger as that he could be held responsible.²⁰ This case has been distinguished in a Bombay case in which the accused was out in his field with his gun—a single-barrel muzzle-loader—and on returning to his sister's house for tea left the gun leaning against a wall on the verandah of the house. Some cats playing about near the house knocked the gun down, and it went off and caused injuries to a woman who had afterwards come and seated herself on the verandah. There was no evidence to show whether the hammer was at full cock or not, but it seemed more probable that the hammer had not been fully let down. It was held that the conduct of the accused amounted to this offence.²¹

4. 'Hurt'.—See s. 319, infra. 5. 'Injury'.—See s. 44, supra.

6. 'Knowingly or negligently'.—The word 'knowingly' is evidently used in this section advisedly and the word 'intentionally' advisedly not used. "Whatever distinction there may be between 'knowingly or negligently' and 'rashly or negligently' ... consciousness is involved in both, while intention is not ... If a person omit to take precautions in respect of explosives in his possession sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life, being conscious of the probability of danger resulting from such omission, he 'knowingly' does that which under this section renders him liable to punishment; ... if a person omits to take such precautions without such consciousness, he is liable, by reason of his negligence, if he 'has not exercised the caution incumbent on him', and which, if he had exercised it, would have created in him the consciousness that his omission was likely to cause danger".²²

7. 'Take such order'.—See s. 283, supra. 8. 'Possession'.—See s. 27, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those required for s. 285, showing that the act of the accused was done with 'any explosive substance'.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

287. Whoever does, with any machinery, any act¹ so rashly or negligently² as to endanger human life³ or to be likely to cause hurt⁴ or injury⁵ to any other person, or knowingly or negligently⁶ omits to take such order⁷ with any machinery in his possession⁸ or under his care⁹ as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger¹⁰ to human life from such machinery, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

Machinery or parts of machinery is and are dangerous if in the ordinary course of human affairs danger may be reasonably anticipated from the use of them without protection. No doubt it would be impossible to say that because an accident had happened once therefore the machinery was dangerous. On the other hand, it is equally out of the question to say that machinery cannot be dangerous unless it is so in the course of careful working. In considering whether machinery is dangerous, the contingency of carelessness on the part of the workman in charge of it, and the frequency with which that contingency is likely to arise, are matters that must be taken into consideration. It is entirely a question of degree.²³

An owner of machinery is criminally liable if he compels his servants to work it in an unsafe condition knowing it to be so, in a manner likely to endanger human life; and under such circumstances the fact that he has employed a competent man to look after the machinery is not a sufficient answer to the charge. If he employs a competent man to work it and leaves him unfettered, he cannot be held criminally responsible for any accident due to the errors of his employee.²⁴

1. 'Act'.—See s. 32, supra. 2. 'Rashly or negligently'.—See s. 279, supra.

3. 'Endanger human life'.—See s. 279, supra. 4. 'Hurt'.—See s. 319, infra.

5. 'Injury'.—See s. 44, supra.

6. 'Knowingly or negligently'.—See s. 286, supra.

7. 'Take such order'.—See s. 288, supra. 8. 'Possession'.—See s. 27, supra.

9. 'Or under his care'.—These words would include an engineer, and all mechanics. The expression used in s. 283 is 'under his charge'.

10. 'Probable danger'.—This section does not require that the owner of machinery should provide perfect security against every possibility of danger. It is enough if he takes reasonable precautions and so much care as is sufficient to guard against such danger as can be expected within the bounds of probability.²⁵ The accused was the owner of a flour mill; a boy took some wheat to be ground there. While the wheat was being ground in the mill, the lid and hopper fell from the top of the mill on to the foot of the boy and his foot was broken. It was held that the accused was not guilty of an offence under this section.¹

CASE.

A shaft with a leather belting was installed in a flour mill for water supply but part of the belting protruded outside the factory building. Two girls who resided in a neighbouring house went into the compound of the flour mill to play and one of them went too near to the belting, was caught therein and killed. The other girl attempted to save her, and in doing so was injured, and crippled for life. It was held that the manager and the mistri in charge of the mill were guilty under this section.²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused did an act that endangered, or was likely to endanger, life, or was likely to cause hurt or injury.

(2) That such act was done with a machinery.

(3) That such act was done rashly or negligently.

Or prove (1) that the accused had in his possession or under his care some machinery.

(2) That he omitted to take such order therewith as was sufficient to guard against a probable danger to human life therefrom.

(3) That such omission was negligent or with knowledge or such probable danger.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Summary trial.

288. tend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section deals with negligent conduct with respect to pulling down or repairing buildings. If a building is situated on a public way and is in a dangerous condition and likely to injure persons using the way then s. 283 will apply and not this section.

1. 'Knowingly or negligently'.—See s. 286, supra.

2. 'Such order...as is sufficient'.—The degree of care required by this section will vary in proportion to the actual necessity of the case. If the building is in a populous place more care will be necessary than when it is in a place less frequented by people.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was pulling down or repairing a building.

(2) That he omitted to take sufficient order therewith to guard against a probable danger of the fall thereof, or any part thereof.

(3) That such fall would probably endanger human life.

(4) That such omission was negligent, or with knowledge of such probable danger.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, first or second class—Triable summarily.

289. Whoever knowingly or negligently¹ omits to take such order² with any animal³ in his possession⁴ as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life, or any probable danger of grievous hurt from such animal,⁵ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Negligent conduct with respect to animal.

COMMENT.

This section deals with improper or careless management of animals.

1. 'Knowingly or negligently'.—The offence consists principally in a knowing or negligent omission, and not merely in an omission which is not an offence.³ See Comment on s. 286, supra.

2. 'Take such order'.—See s. 283, supra. The tethering of a horse in a narrow street where people cannot pass without going near the animal's hind legs is a negligent omission to take order with the animal sufficient to satisfy the requirements of this section.⁴

3. 'Animal'.—See s. 46, supra. This section does not refer to savage animals alone, but to any animal, e.g. a pony,⁵ or a dog.⁶

In the case of wild and savage animals, a savage or mischievous temper is presumed to be known to their owner and to all men as a usual accompaniment of such animals; and, hence, a positive duty is cast on the owner to protect the public against the mischief resulting from such animals being at large. Anyone who keeps such a wild animal as a tiger or a bear, which escapes and does damage, is liable without any proof of the animal's ferocity. In such a case it may be said res ipsa loquitur.

In the case of animals which are tame and mild in their general temper no mischievous disposition is presumed. It must be shown that the accused knew that the animal was accustomed to do mischief. Some evidence must be given of the existence of an abnormally vicious disposition.⁷ A single instance of ferocity, even a knowledge that it has evinced a savage disposition, is sufficient notice.⁸

"Before the owner or keeper of the animal can be convicted under this section. it must be made out that the animal was known to be ferocious, and that it was negligently kept. It is, however, not necessary to show that the animal had actually bitten or injured another person before it bit or injured the complainant: it would be enough to show that, to the knowledge of the owner, it had evinced a savage disposition. e.g. by attempting to bite".⁹ Where the accused's buffalo attacked the complainant's buffalo and injured the latter by breaking its leg, he was held not guilty of this offence as there was no evidence to show that the buffalo was of a savage disposition as against human beings.¹⁰ Where a person was injured by a buffalo, which was known to be a dangerous animal, the herdsman who was present and failed to avert the injury and the owner of the buffalo were held to have committed an offence under this section.¹¹

4. 'Possession'.—See s. 27, supra. The animal must be in the actual possession of the person against whom a charge is brought under this section, whoever may be the owner of it. Where the accused, a horsekeeper, harnessed his master's horse, put him into his carriage, and then went away, leaving the horse and carriage standing in the road of the compound of his master's house, without any justification, it was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section, since the horse was not the less in the actual possession of the servant, because it was for some purpose in the constructive possession of his master.¹² A bull was let loose by the father of the accused some years ago. On its becoming vicious it was ordered to be shot. The accused having claimed its ownership was convicted of this offence. It was held that it could not be said that the animal was in the possession of the accused and therefore the conviction was illegal.¹³ A Hindu set at large, in accordance with a religious usage, a young bull, which a considerable time afterwards became dangerous. He was prosecuted and convicted under this section. It was held that as the bull was not then in his possession and was not dangerous when set at large, the conviction was bad.¹⁴

5. 'Probable danger to human life, or any probable danger of grievous hurt from such animal'.—'Grievous hurt' is defined in s. 320, infra. Unless there is a probability of danger to human life, or of danger of grievous hurt no negligent omission to take such care of an animal as to guard against such danger will be punishable under this section. Where a pony kicked a child on a road, a conviction under this section was set aside, because there was no such negligence as would produce danger to human life, or grievous hurt;¹⁵ but where a pony, which was tied negligently, got loose, and ran through a crowded bazaar, it was held that the conviction was good, because the pony on such an occasion might create danger to the lives or limbs of men, women and children walking in the bazaar.¹⁶ Where the accused allowed a bull, which had a savage disposition to attack bullocks, to be at large, it was held that he was liable under this section as he had knowledge that there was probable danger to human life or limb.¹⁷ Where the accused's dog bit the complainant and thereby caused hurt, it was held that he was liable under this section and not under s. 323.¹⁸ Where the accused's bullock escaped from a heard and finding its way into a hospital, which was close by the accused's house, ate up some clothes, it was held that he was not guilty, because it was through no negligence of his that the bullock escaped and after the escape he had done all he could to find it.¹⁹ The mere fact that a rope tied to a bullock, when violently strained, broke, was held to afford no proof of negligence.²⁰ The accused owned an ape which escaped by breaking its chain. It was afterwards caught but escaped again. On this he was convicted under this section, but the High Court quashed the conviction holding it must be established in the affirmative that the accused knowingly or negligently omitted to take such order with the animal as was sufficient to guard against probable danger to human life or probable danger of grievous hurt from such animal.²¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the animal was in the possession of the accused.

(2) That the accused omitted to take sufficient order therewith to guard against probable danger to human life or of grievous hurt therefrom.²²

(3) That such omission was negligent, or with knowledge of such probable danger.

If the animal is not naturally fierce or vicious, the onus of proving negligence lies on the prosecution.²³

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

290. Whoever commits a public nuisance in any case not other-

COMMENT.

In several sections of this Chapter punishments are provided for various specific public nuisances. This section provides for the punishment of any nuisance falling within the four corners of the definition given in s. 268 but not punishable under any other section.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused did an act or was guilty of an illegal omission.

(2) That such act or omission caused injury, danger, or annoyance.

(3) That such injury, danger, or annoyance was common to the public or the people in general who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity.

Or prove (1) that the accused did an act or was guilty of an illegal omission.

(2) That the act or omission in question must necessarily cause injury, obstruction, danger, or annoyance.

(3) That such injury, danger, or annoyance must necessarily be caused to persons who may have occasion to use any public right.²⁴

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Summary trial.

Imprisonment in default of fine.—Such imprisonment should be simple only, according to the Bombay High Court;²⁵ but, according to the Madras High Court, the award of rigorous imprisonment is not illegal.¹

Offence under special Act.—The fact that there was a special law to meet a particular offence does not prevent the punishment of the offenders under the Penal Code, if an offence which could have been rightly punished under it was established.² The accused should be given an opportunity to meet the charge.³

Prosecution should be against proper person.—A prosecution cannot be instituted against the chariman of a municipality under this section for keeping a rubbish depot in the neighbourhood of houses but should be against the municipal corporation.⁴

291. Whoever repeats or continues a public nuisance, having

COMMENT.

This section punishes a person continuing a nuisance after he is enjoined by a public servant not to repeat or continue it. Sections 142 and 143 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, for instance, empower a Magistrate to forbid an act causing a public nuisance. The Civil Procedure Code also empowers a Court to issue a temporary injunction.

1. 'Enjoined.'—It must be proved that the accused had on some previous occasion committed the particular nuisance, and had been personally enjoined not to repeat or continue it, and had repeated and continued it.⁵ A District Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate, or any other Magistrate empowered by the Provincial Government or the District Magistrate in this behalf, may order any person not to repeat or continue a public nuisance.⁶

2. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

3. 'Injunction'.—The injunction should be before the Court; a proclamation to the public, or a portion of the public, is not sufficient. Strict proof of all the circumstances constituting the offence and especially of one which is not malum in se should be required as the basis of a conviction.⁷

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the issue of the injunction.

(2) That such injunction was legally issued.

(3) That the injunction is one which restrains the repetition or continuance of a public nuisance.

(4) That the accused was enjoined by such injunction not to repeat or continue such nuisance.

(5) That he has repeated or continued the same public nuisance.

Before a conviction can be held under this section, there must be proof that there was a previous conviction of an offence and an injunction by a public servant to desist from continuing such nuisance.⁸

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class—Summary trial.

The order of the Magistrate forbidding the continuance of the nuisance, or evidence of notice of such character as to make plain the precise terms of the order and notice, should be recorded in the case.⁹

shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.

Exception.—This section does not extend to any book, pamphlet, writing, drawing or painting kept or used bona fide for religious purposes or any representation sculptured, engraved, painted or otherwise represented on or in any temple, or on any car used for the conveyance of idols, or kept or used for any religious purpose.

COMMENT.

This and the following section were inserted by s. 2 of the Obscene Publications Act (VIII of 1925) for the purpose of giving effect to the International Convention for the Suppression of the Circulation of, and Traffic in, Obscene Publications signed at Geneva on behalf of the Governor-General in Council on September 12, 1923.

This section gives effect to Article I of the International Convention.

Intention.—The intention of the seller and distributor of obscene literature must be gathered from the character of the matter contained in such books. If a person chooses to sell and distribute what is obscene, it must be presumed that he intended the natural consequences of his act, namely, corruption of the minds and prejudice of the morals of the public. It is not sufficient for him to say that his intentions were good. It is his public act that must be the test of his intentions, and having done an unlawful act it is no answer to say that he thought it lawful.¹⁰

1. 'Obscene'.—"The test of obscenity is this, whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall".¹¹ If a publication is detrimental to public morals and calculated to produce a pernicious effect in depraving and debauching the minds of the persons into whose hands it may come, it will be an obscene publication, which it is the intention of the law to suppress.¹² If in fact the work is one which would certainly suggest to the minds of the young of either sex or even to persons of more advanced years, thoughts of most impure and libidinous character, its publication is an offence, though the accused has in view an ulterior object which is innocent or even laudable.¹³ Anything "calculated to inflame the passions" is obscene.¹⁴ Anything distinctly calculated to incite a reader to indulge in acts of indecency or immorality is obscene, e.g. a book containing a description of defective sexual enjoyment with advice for heightening and prolonging such enjoyment in the case of normal persons.¹⁵ A book may be obscene although it contains but a single obscene passage.¹⁶ A religious or classical work does not become obscene, simply on account of its containing some objectionable passages, because the tendency of such publications is not to deprave or corrupt morals. If objectionable passages in a religious book are extracted and printed separately and they deal with matters which are to be judged by the standard of human conduct, as where they relate to immoral acts of human beings, and the tendency of such publication is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to immoral influences, the publication may not be justified, though the passages form part of a religious book.¹⁷ If the detailed passages in a book are of an obscene character, the author's liability in respect of those passages will not be saved or avoided merely by reference to other passages in the book which may contain moral precepts of an unexceptionable character. The important point to look at is rather the form of the expression than the actual meaning. For the same meaning may be obscenely expressed by one form of language, and yet by the use of another form of language may be couched in expressions free from reproach.¹⁸ Obscene passages are not excused because the rest of the publication is unobjectionable.¹⁹ It is no justification that the matter published is written by an eminent writer or is composed in a style not easily understood by all,²⁰ or that the publication is a medical one and sold only to registered subscribers.²¹ Where a book is intended to give advice to married people on how to regulate the sexual side of their lives to the best advantage, it will not come within the purview of this section.²²

Clause (d).—In the Punjab a special Act has been passed for the purpose of suppressing indecent advertisements (The Punjab Suppression of Indecent Advertisements Act, Punj. Act VII of 1941).

Exception.—Under the Exception religious sculptures, paintings, and engravings are excepted. But works of art are never considered obscene.

Nude pictures.—Nude pictures which exhibit a work of art will not fall under this section. It may be interesting to note the observations of an English author on this subject. "In countries, like India, where coolies wear next to nothing and some women freely expose their charms, men and women wearing costumes which they would be taken up for, if walking in Piccadilly, it seems absurd to say that photographs of the nude are in themselves obscene." A picture of a woman in the nude is not per se obscene. For the purpose of deciding whether the picture is obscene or not, one has to consider to a great extent the surrounding circumstances, the pose, the posture, the suggestive element in the picture, the person in whose hands it is likely to fall, etc.²³ But pictures of a bawdy character, if filthy and disgusting, will be considered obscene. Publication of an advertisement of a book (Kashmiri Kok Shastra) saying that it contained "pictures of eighty-four postures of men and women with interesting descriptions" when it did not in fact contain pictures of men and women cohabiting was held not to come within the purview of this section.²⁴

Advocating checks to conception.—There is nothing obscene in advocating checks to conception, or in the explanation of what these checks are, in the mere statement of the places where, and the prices at which, they can be procured.²⁵

Purchase to entrap seller.—The sale of an obscene print to a person in private, he having in the first instance requested that such prints should be shown to him, his object being to prosecute the seller, is sufficient to sustain the charge.¹

Liability of newspaper proprietor for act of his servant.—The mere fact that a person is the proprietor and publisher of a newspaper is not sufficient to render him criminally liable in respect of matter inserted therein by one of his servants. There must be a distinct finding that the matter complained of was inserted by the order or owing to the negligence of the proprietor.²

CASES.

A society called "The Protestant Electoral Union" exposed for sale at their office a pamphlet entitled "The Confessional Unmasked", showing the depravity of the Romish priesthood, the iniquity of the confessional, and the questions put to females in confession. The pamphlet consisted of extracts from the works of theologians on the doctrines and discipline of the Church of Rome, and particularly on the practice of auricular confession. The pamphlet also contained a preface and notes and comments condemnatory of the tenets and principles of the authors of the work from which the extracts were made. About one-half of the pamphlet related to casuistical and controversial questions, but the remainder of it was obscene. A member of the Society kept and sold these pamphlets. It was held that the publication of such a pamphlet was an offence as the inevitable effect of the publication must be to injure public morality.³ Subsequently to this case, a pamphlet was published giving a correct report of the trial by one G for selling "Confessional Unmasked", but setting out that work in full. It was held that the pamphlet, though a report of judicial proceedings, was an obscene book.⁴ A pamphlet which ridiculed the Head Priest of the community of Bohras and which abounded in passages expressing or presenting to the mind or view something which delicacy, purity and decency forbade to be expressed or exposed came within the purview of this section.⁵

The accused published a pamphlet containing a series of quotations from the Koran with his comments. There were several passages in it of an objectionable nature but there was one relating to the Virgin Mary which was perverted by the incompleteness of the quotation and commented on in a very offensive form, the language employed being not such as might be used in a bona fide controversial treatise. It was held that he was guilty under this section.⁶

A fictitious biography, describing only a series of sexual adventures, both natural and unnatural, which the author had had from boyhood onwards and which, it is apparent, he vastly enjoyed, and ascribing similar indulgences to highly placed members of the society who are easily recognizable, would be obscene, although there might not be any gross details or indecent language and although pious remarks about the ruinous effect of sexual vices might be thrown in here and there in a flippant manner.⁷

PRACTICE.

Evidence—Prove (1) that the book, etc., is of an obscene nature.

(2) That the accused—

(a) sold, let to hire, distributed, publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation, or for purpose of sale, hire, distribution, public exhibition or circulation made, produced or had in his possession any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, drawing, painting, representation of figure or any other obscene object whatsoever, or

(b) imported, exported or conveyed any obscene object for any of the purposes aforesaid, or knowing or having reason to believe that such object would be sold, let to hire, distributed or publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation, or

(c) took part in, or received profits from, any business in the course of which he knew or had reason to believe that any such obscene objects were, for any of the purposes aforesaid, made, produced, purchased, kept, imported, exported, conveyed, publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation, or

(d) advertised or made known by any means whatsoever that any person was engaged or was ready to engage in any act which was an offence under this section, or that any such obscene object could be procured from or through any person, or

(e) offered or attempted to do any act which was an offence under this section.

The Court is entitled to rely on its own judgment as well as on evidence of witnesses in deciding whether a book is obscene or not.⁸

Power of destruction.—On a conviction the Court may order the destruction of all the copies of the thing in respect of which the conviction was had.¹⁰

Charge.—A charge under this and s. 294 should be made specific in regard to the representations and words alleged to have been exhibited and uttered, and to be obscene; and the Magistrate, in convicting, should in his decision state distinctly what were the particular representations and words which, he found on the evidence, had been exhibited and uttered, and which he adjudged to be obscene within the meaning of those sections. Where no such specific decision has been given, the High Court, if the case has been transferred, may either try the case de novo or dismiss it on the ground that the Magistrate has come to no finding on which the conviction can be sustained.¹¹ But when the prosecution case is that the whole of the publication is obscene, then although the charge may not have specified the passages considered offensive and although the English practice of depositing the publication together with particulars to its offensive character may not have been followed either, the High Court will not interfere in revision if the defence was not misled, and no objection was taken at the trial.¹²

Punishment.—The section says nothing about intention or about medical works or about agency of distribution or about immunity because only concrete cases are dealt with; or the rest of the publication is unobjectionable; but these points nevertheless indirectly affect the quantum of punishment.¹³

293. Whoever sells, lets to hire, distributes, exhibits or circulates to any person under the age of twenty years any such obscene object as is referred to in the last preceding section, or offers or attempts so to do, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Sale, etc., of obscene objects to young person.

COMMENT.

This section was substituted for the original section by s. 2 of the Obscene Publications Act (VIII of 1925). It merely enhances the punishment where the obscene objects are sold, etc., to persons under the age of twenty years.

"In the final Act of the International Conference which drafted the convention, it was stated that the conference generally was of opinion that the offence of offering, delivering, selling or distributing obscene objects must be held to have been aggravated when committed in respect of minors. The Council [of the League] considered that it would be preferable to leave each State free to fix the age under which a person should be considered to be a minor for the purposes of this provision."¹⁴

The principle of this recommendation has been given effect to in this section.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the book, etc., is of an obscene nature.

(2) That the person to whom it was sold, etc., or offered or attempted to be sold was under the age of twenty years.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section was substituted for the original section by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (III of 1895), s. 3. The object of the first clause is to meet a case of indecency common in the Presidency of Madras. It has reference to an unreported case in that Presidency.

1. 'Annoyance.'—Unless annoyance is caused the act will not be punishable. There must be definite evidence that annoyance was caused to a particular person or persons in general.

2. 'Obscene act.'—Indecent exposure of one's person or sexual intercourse in a public place will be punished under this section.

3. 'Public place.'—See Comment on s. 159, supra, as to the meaning attached to this expression.¹⁷ Acts such as indecent exposure of one's person in an omnibus,¹⁸ in a public urinal,¹⁹ or in a place where the public go,²⁰ will fall under this section. In England it has been held that an indecent exposure in a place of public resort, if actually seen by only one person, no other person being in a position to see it, is not a common nuisance.²¹ If the act be done where a great number of persons may be offended by it, and several see it, it is sufficient. Where a man exposed himself indecently on a roof at the back of a house so as to be visible to persons in the back premises of many other houses, but not so as to be capable of being seen from any place open to the public, and seven persons in one house saw the exposure, it was held that he could be convicted for his act.²²

4. 'Songs.'—A lavni is not necessarily an obscene song. It may be, and often it is, so, but it must be proved that the words of it are actually obscene before a conviction can be supported under this section.²³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused did some act; or that the accused sang, recited or uttered any obscene songs, ballad or words.

(2) That this was done in or near a public place.

(3) That it was of an obscene nature.

(4) That it caused annoyance to others.

Omission to set out obscene words in evidence.—Where the obscene words used by the accused were not set out in the evidence, it was held that the omission was not a sufficient ground for setting aside a conviction.²⁴

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate.

A conviction under this section for uttering an obscene abuse in a public place may amount to a conviction for an offence involving a breach of the peace within the meaning of s. 106, Criminal Procedure Code.²⁵

Sentence.—A sentence of three months' rigorous imprisonment for using obscene language in a public place was held to be unduly severe.¹

COMMENT.

This section was inserted by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (XXVII of 1870), s. 10. A lottery stands on the same footing as gambling because both of them are games of chance. The object of this section is to save people from the effects of unauthorised lotteries.

"Every lottery is either authorized or not authorized by Government. The section does not touch authorized lotteries, but intends to save people from the effects of those not authorized (1st) by prohibiting the keeping of offices or places for drawing them, and (2ndly) by prohibiting the publication of any advertisement relating to them. After the first prohibition, the chance of any office being kept in British India for drawing lotteries not authorized by Government is very small indeed. But people not subject to our laws may contrive to open offices for that purpose out of British India, but still near our own doors—at Navsari or Daman for instance, and then send advertisements to all the widely-circulated newspapers throughout British India. In that case, if the section were to be narrowly construed as applying only to lotteries to be drawn in British India, the object aimed at by the second prohibition, to prevent the mischief of people in British India being drawn into temptation by such publications, would be very nearly, if not utterly, defeated. The words of the section are wide enough to include foreign lotteries, and we have no reason to suppose the Legislature intended to exclude advertisements relating to them from the operation of section 294A."²

Ingredients.—The first part of the section deals with keeping a lottery office. It has two essentials:—

1. Keeping of any office or place for the purpose of drawing any lottery.
2. Such lottery must not be authorized by Government.

The second part of the section deals with the publisher of any proposal regarding a lottery.

The ingredients of the offence under the second part of this section are, first, there must be a lottery, secondly, there must be a drawing of any ticket, lot, number or figure in such lottery, and, thirdly, there must be a publication of a proposal to pay any money or to deliver any goods or to do or forbear doing anything for the benefit of any person on any event or contingency relative or applicable to such drawing.³

1. 'Whoever keeps any office or place for the purpose of drawing any lottery.'—The fact that an association of persons, the business carried on by which is in the nature of a lottery, is registered, does not exempt the persons keeping the office from liability under this section.⁴

'Keeps any office or place.'—The offence is the keeping of an office or place for the purpose of a lottery. Using a place once is not keeping it for that purpose. In order to constitute a keeping there must be something habitual.⁵ A certain degree of habitualness or continuity of operation is intended as also a fixed or ascertained locality for the drawing.⁶ The members of the committee of a club who exercise full control over club matters, inclusive of the premises, "keep" the premises of the club.⁷

The words "office or place" for the purpose of drawing any lottery mean an office or place intended to be the scene of the actual drawing of the lottery, and do not include an office or place kept only for the correspondence and other work connected with a lottery advertised "as going to be in some public place to be selected later on."⁸ It is, however, not necessary that the place should be kept solely for the purpose of drawing a lottery.⁹ Where a house is kept open for a double purpose, viz. as an honest social club for those who do not desire to play, as well as for the purpose of gaming for those who desire to play, it is a house opened and kept for the purpose of gaming, and it is not necessary to show that the house is used exclusively for the purpose of drawing a lottery.¹⁰

Clause (1) applies to cases in which it is shown that the accused did keep an office where they carried on the necessary preliminary work for running a lottery and received the lottery moneys, and which they held out to the public as the place where the lottery would finally be drawn. It is not necessary that the lottery should be actually drawn. It is enough if all the preliminary work is carried on and moneys are received for the purpose of a lottery.¹¹

"The purpose of drawing any lottery' would seem to involve substantially the same notion as 'the event or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of any ticket, lot, number or figure in any such lottery' and the ruling in *Emperor v. Vazirally*¹² would apply to s. 294A, first part, as much as to the second part of the section. The Magistrate has stated in his judgment that it would not be necessary to prove actual drawing in bringing the offence home to the accused. This seems to be a view of the law which is opposed to the ruling of our Court in Emperor v. Vazirally."¹³

'Drawing.'—The word 'drawing' is used in its physical sense; the actual drawing of lots is an essential ingredient of the offence under this section.¹⁴ It does not mean conducting. The Legislature did not intend to give it any such comprehensive and unusual meaning.¹⁵ The meaning of 'drawing' relative to a lottery is that lots should be drawn by some mechanical or human agency involving their chance extraction. Where there is no physical or mechanical drawing to determine the lucky lots which depend on a sort of arithmetical progression based on an original number to be determined merely by the chance death of a bond-holder, there is no drawing within the meaning of the section.¹⁶ The accused was running a lottery in which the only substantial prize fell to the agent who sold the largest number of tickets. The ticket bearing the highest number among those sold by that agent was a number upon which all the other lucky numbers were based. The holders of those lucky numbers received a small prize of one rupee. It was held that the accused was not guilty, although he was conducting a lottery, because he had not been keeping an office or place for the purpose of drawing a lottery, and had not been publishing any proposal to pay any sum on any contingency relative to the drawing of any ticket, lot, or number, or figure in any such lottery.¹⁷

'Lottery.'—A lottery is a scheme for distribution of prizes by lot or chance.¹⁸ It is a game of chance in which the event of either gain or loss of the absolute right to a prize or prizes by the person purchasing tickets is made wholly dependent upon the drawing or casting of lot.¹⁹ Tickets are only the tokens of the chance purchased, and it is the purchase of this chance which is the essence of a lottery. It is only when the chances of a prize are obtained wholly gratuitously that the scheme would not be a lottery.²⁰ It makes no difference that the distribution is part of a genuine mercantile transaction.²¹

A prize chit transaction, in which the prize winner is ascertained by drawing lots and is under no liability to pay future subscriptions after the prize is won and whose extent of gain depends upon the chance of the draw, amounts to a lottery.²² A scheme may fairly be regarded as a lottery if it is clear that whatever other benefit the subscriber or competitor may get in return for his money, the chance of getting the prize was also part of the bargain and must have entered into his calculation. It is the fact of the prize and not the source from which it is paid that is the deciding factor. Any and every advantage which a person subscribing to a scheme may hope to get will amount to a "prize" if his getting it will depend on the drawing of lots. The fact that promoters hoped to reimburse themselves in due course from out of the interest earned will not make the payments to the subscribers who are lucky in the early drawings any the less a prize.²³ When a scheme has for its object the carrying on of a legitimate business, the fact that it provides for the distribution of its profits in certain events by lot will not vitiate the scheme.²⁴

The principle underlying a lottery is that there should be a distribution of prizes determined solely by chance; but if the results of the lotteries are such that no prize at all is distributed and the organizer of the lottery pockets the whole of the stakes advanced the transaction does not cease to be a lottery. The actual distribution of a prize or prizes and contribution of the whole stake by the adventurers are not essential, the essential factor in the case is that there should be a scheme for distribution of a prize or prizes to be determined solely by chance and if chance so decrees that no prize is to be distributed to the adventurers and the stakes are to be appropriated by the organizer of the lottery, the scheme is none the less a lottery.²⁵

The necessary effect of a lottery is to beget a spirit of speculation and gaming that is often productive of serious evils.

Neither under the English law nor under the Penal Code is it made an offence to buy a ticket in a lottery. Mere purchase of tickets does not amount to aiding the accused in keeping a place for the drawing of a lottery within the meaning of s. 107.¹

Agreement for contributions to be repaid by lot is not lottery.—A transaction is not necessarily a lottery simply because a matter of whatever kind is agreed to be decided by lot. Where twenty persons agreed that each should subscribe 200 rupees by monthly instalments of ten rupees, and that each in his turn as determined by lot should take the whole of the subscriptions for one month, it was held that the agreement was not illegal.² An agreement whereby a number of persons subscribe, each a certain sum, by periodical instalments, with the object that each in his turn (to be decided by lot), shall take the whole subscription for each instalment, all such persons being returned the amount of their contribution, the common fund being lent to each subscriber in turn, was held to be not illegal.³

2. 'Authorized by Provincial Government.'—The lottery must have been authorized by the Provincial Government. It would not be sufficient to show that it has been authorized by British Government of another country, e.g. Australia.⁴ A Collector is not authorized to sanction a lottery, and the mere act of taking income-tax on the profits of a lottery will not constitute authorization.⁵ The withholding of prosecution for a certain period by the Crown does not amount to an authorization of the lottery prior to that date.⁶

3. 'Publishes.'—The word 'publishes' includes both the person who sends a proposal as well as the proprietor of a newspaper who prints the proposal as an advertisement. It is not necessary that there should be some public advertisement in the sense of a written publication in newspapers or handbills. If a number of persons go about canvassing for subscribers on the basis of a scheme settled beforehand by its promoters, this would amount to a publication of the proposal.⁷ Publication is established by the very fact that the proposal forms have been printed in the press.⁸

"The intention of the Legislature appears to have been, not only that chances, &c., in the lottery should not be sold, but also that the public should not be informed where such chances, &c., could be purchased. And they enacted, that no person should publish these proposals to the world, that the poor and ignorant sort of people might not know where these transactions were going on."⁹

Mere publication in a newspaper will make the proprietor liable. Under the Press and Registration of Books Act¹⁰ the printer or publisher is responsible for every thing that appears in the newspaper.¹¹ He can, however, escape liability by showing that he was absent bona fide, that is, not with the purpose of evading responsibility, when a particular thing complained of was printed.¹²

Where ticket-books relating to a lottery were delivered by the accused to several persons with a view to the tickets therein being sold by these persons to others, it was held that the delivery of the ticket-books could not be considered in any sense to be a mere casual or gratuitous delivery and the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.¹³

Publication of advertisement.—The proprietor of a Bombay newspaper who published an advertisement in his paper relating to a Melbourne lottery was convicted under this section.¹⁴ Publication of an advertisement of a Rs. 52,500 lottery, by which a ginning factory was to be raffled at Rs. 5 tickets was held to be an offence within this section.¹⁵ Where on the face of a lottery ticket it is stated that the prize, if any, due to the number on the ticket will be paid, it contains a proposal inviting persons to take part in the lottery, and offering such a ticket for sale amounts to a publication of the said proposal and constitutes this offence.¹⁶ A mere publication on a trade hand-bill that tickets in a lottery (unauthorized) can be had at a particular place is no offence since it does not constitute a publication of a proposal to pay any sum on any event or contingency relating or applicable to the drawing of any ticket in any lottery not authorized by Government.¹⁷ But the publication of the words "detailed prize lists will be supplied to all subscribers to the lottery" amounts to an offence under this section.¹⁸

Publication of proposal.—The accused published a circular notifying different prizes on horses winning at the Derby race and on starters, and also other special prizes. The circular stated: "The sweep will close on May 23, 1924, and the draw under the supervision of the patrons stated in the tickets will take place on May 26, 1924." The accused having been charged with publishing the proposal for a lottery, it was held that he was guilty of the offence charged, since he had published a proposal to pay a sum for the benefit of a person on an event or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of the ticket in a lottery; and it did not matter that the payment proposed to be made was not made by the person advertising.¹⁹ An announcement was made in the Sun, an evening paper, sold at half-penny, that for a certain period in certain issues of the newspaper spots of varying size and shape would be printed in various parts of the issues. It was also stated that on a certain day an announcement would appear in the paper showing the exact configuration of certain spots which were to be declared to be winning spots, and that the person who had cut out from the various issues of the paper and sent to the office of the paper a portion of the newspaper containing the facsimile of what had been declared to be the winning spot would receive a prize. It was also announced that the prizes differed for different spots. The winning spots were arbitrarily selected by the proprietors of the newspaper and the winning of the prizes depended wholly upon chance. It was held that this was a publication of a proposal and scheme for a lottery.²⁰

The accused and another person ordered 500,000 circulars to be printed and prepared for posting. These circulars contained a proposal and scheme for the sale of tickets in a lottery. The envelopes for the circulars were supplied ready addressed by the accused, and the printers were paid by the accused by means of cheques signed by the other person. The printers printed 200,000 of the circulars, placed them in envelopes and closed and stamped the envelopes and delivered them to the accused, who took them away for the purpose of posting them. A large quantity of the envelopes was stopped in the course of post under instructions from higher authorities in the post office. Some of the envelopes were found open, but the contents of the others were not examined in the post office, and all were prevented from reaching the addressees. The accused was convicted under s. 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV, c. 60), of 'publishing' a proposal and scheme for the sale of tickets in a lottery. It was held that although none of the circulars had reached the addressees, yet, as the proposal was made known to the printers, there was a sufficient publication within the Act, and the conviction must be affirmed. Earl of Reading, C.J., said that "once it is established... that the appellant was responsible for sending the circular to the printing company to be printed, and that it was printed, there is an end to this appeal, for it is inconceivable that none of the printers read the circular. It was sent for the express purpose of being reproduced. When received for that purpose the printers must have read it. But it is argued that nevertheless, that was not the publishing of a proposal. To my mind the fallacy of that argument consists in saying that publication only means making known the nature of the proposal. The moment the document has been made known to another, then it is published."²¹

CASES.

Transactions deciding prizes by chance amount to lottery.—English cases.—A horse race being about to be run, 155 persons subscribed £1 each upon the terms that the names of the horses should be placed on separate cards, in one box, and the names of the subscribers on separate cards in another box, and that two disinterested persons should draw these cards by chance, one from each box, after the other, and that the person whose name was drawn next after the name of the winning horse should be entitled to £100 out of the entire fund. It was held that this amounted to a lottery.²⁵ The programme of an entertainment stated that at its conclusion the proprietor "would distribute amongst the audience a shower of gold and silver treasure on a scale utterly without parallel, besides a shower of smaller presents, all of which would be impartially divided amongst the audience and given away". The seats of the audience were numbered. At the conclusion of the entertainment the proprietor called out a number on a seat, and delivered one of the articles to the person occupying that seat; and in that way distributed all the articles amongst the audience. It was held that this was a lottery.¹ A transaction in which tickets were drawn by subscribers of a shilling which entitled them at all events to what was professed to be a shilling's worth of goods, and also the chance of certain bonuses of goods of greater value than the shilling, was held to be an illegal lottery.² The appellant erected a tent, in which he sold packets, each containing a pound of tea, at 2s. 6d. a packet. In each packet was a coupon entitling the purchaser to a prize, and this was publicly stated by the appellant before the sale, but the purchasers did not know, until after the sale, what prizes they were entitled to, and the prizes varied in character and value. The tea was good and worth the money paid for it. It was held that the act of the appellant did constitute a lottery.³ H kept a sweetstuff shop, and sold penny packets of American caramel. Several packets contained a half-penny in addition to a fair penny-worth of sweets. There had been no advertisement as to these inclosures. It was held that H was guilty of keeping a lottery.⁴ The proprietor of a paper conducted competitions in the following manner. A sentence was inserted in the paper with one word missing; intending competitors were required to cut out a coupon attached to the paper, to write the missing word on the coupon and send it, together with a fee of 1s. for each coupon, to the proprietor. The missing word was decided upon before the commencement of the competition. The entrance fees were divided among the successful competitors. It was held that the competition constituted a lottery.⁵ A publican arranged at his beer-house a sweepstake on a coming horse race. There were sixty-one entries, each person paying 6d. to the publican. Three prizes of 15s., 10s. and 5s., respectively, were offered by the publican on the result of the race; and one of the conditions of the sweepstakes was that the person who won the first prize should pay the publican at the beer-house for two gallons of beer to be consumed in his house, the person who won the second prize should pay for one gallon, and the person who won the third prize should pay for two quarts of beer. The winners of the prizes were ascertained by a drawing at the beer-house, and the prizes were given by the publican to the winners, less the price of the beer which was deducted by him from the prizes. It was held that the sweepstake was an illegal lottery.⁶

The proprietors of a weekly newspaper caused medals to be distributed gratuitously among members of the public; each medal bore a distinctive number and the words, "Keep this, it may be worth £100. See the Weekly Telegraph to-day"; the winning numbers, which were arbitrarily selected by the newspaper proprietors and were unknown to the distributors, were published weekly in the newspaper. There were no coupons, and it was not necessary that the holder of a medal should purchase a copy of the paper as a condition of receiving a prize; information as to the winning numbers could be obtained without charge at the office of the newspaper. The object of the scheme was to induce persons to inspect or buy the paper, and the circulation in fact increased considerably during the progress of the scheme. It was held that, although it was possible for an individual holder of a medal to obtain a prize without paying anything for his chance, the medal holders as a body collectively contributed sums of money to the fund out of which the money came for the prizes, and that the scheme was a lottery.⁷

Tickets, each bearing a different number, were sold for 6d. each upon the terms that the purchaser of the ticket bearing a number to be subsequently drawn by an independent person should be entitled to a bicycle as a prize. The bicycle was presented as a gift by a firm of cycle manufacturers for the purposes of advertisement, no part of the money paid by the purchasers of the tickets being used for acquiring the bicycle. It was held that as each purchaser of a ticket bought a chance, and the holder of the ticket bearing the winning number was determined by chance, the scheme constituted a lottery and it was immaterial that no part of the money paid by the purchasers of the tickets was used for the purpose of the prize.⁸

The respondent, the proprietor of a music hall entertainment, who was giving a performance in a provincial theatre, announced to the audience that, "being possessed of a certain amount of wealth", he would distribute some of it, and his assistants would be supplied with postal orders, to be given away as he thought fit. Under his directions the assistants went along the seats, and they handed postal orders of small amounts to persons nearest to them. Other postal orders for larger sums were handed to members of the audience who answered questions put by him to them from the stage as to their circumstances, and in other instances to persons who stated their circumstances and requested the gift of an order. It was held that the distribution of the postal orders was made and determined by chance and without the exercise of any real judgment on the part of the respondent; and that the respondent had, therefore, 'exercised a lottery' contrary to s. 2 of the Lotteries Act, 1699.⁹

A newspaper published an offer of prizes for the correct solution of a crossword puzzle. A number of correct words in the puzzle were not difficult to arrive at, but some of the clues could be answered by one of two or more alternative words, and, where alternative answers existed, the word selected beforehand as correct was not always the most appropriate or the one bearing the best relation to the clue. It was held that the competition was to be regarded as a lottery in that the correct solution was not to be picked out of the efforts of the competitors in competition with each other, but was to be the one most nearly coinciding with a set of words chosen beforehand by a person unknown to the competitors.¹⁰ A limited company employed agents to distribute tickets bearing the names of races, horses and jockeys, and also the name of the company, and an offer to exchange the tickets for goods on demand. A member of the public receiving a ticket was entitled to bet on the combinations named on the ticket, in which case if he won he received the amount of his bet; if he lost he was entitled to exchange the ticket for goods worth six pence, through the firm's agents. By conditions on the ticket he paid no money to the agents, but undertook to pay six pence if he lost. The company and its directors were convicted at petty sessions under the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, and appealed. It was held that the scheme was a lottery and that the appearance of the name of the company on the tickets, together with evidence that the same agent had distributed similar tickets which had been exchanged by the company for goods, was evidence connecting the agent with the company.¹¹

Indian cases.—Where the agreement for the sale of bonds was: "Every subscriber pays Rs. 10-8-0 and gets a bond for Rs. 10. This sum is guaranteed by one of seven banks and not only is negotiable, but can be cashed at the bank at par at any time. The draws were to start when 2,000 tickets had been sold, and at stated intervals further drawings were to be made until every one had got a prize or had had their money returned. Those who did not draw prizes in the first draw would go on drawing at each distribution till they got a prize, or decided to withdraw their money. Thus, the original ten rupees was absolutely safe, the extra eight annas was to cover the cost of correspondence, etc." It was held that the agreement showed that there was a scheme for the distribution of prizes by lot or chance and the accused who put forward the scheme were guilty of an offence within the second part of this section.¹²

The accused, the sole agent in India of a certain brand of cigarette manufactured at Belfast, sent ten notes of five rupees each to the manufacturers, who put each note in a separate packet of cigarettes, mixed those packets with other packets which contained no notes, and sent them out to the accused in India. The accused published hand-bills advertising the prize of Rs. 5 which could automatically be obtained by purchasers of the cigarettes, which were sold at the same rate as before. On a prosecution of the accused under the second part of this section, it was held that the scheme by the accused for distribution of prizes by lot or chance amounted to a lottery, and the publication of hand-bills did not fall under this section (second part) inasmuch as there was no proposal to pay the sum on any event or contingency relative to the drawing of any lot. The word 'drawing' is used in the first and second part of this section in its physical sense; the actual drawing of lots is an essential ingredient of the offence under the section.¹³

The accused invited the public to subscribe a large sum for an association whose object was said to be for the relief of people in debt or distress. There was no provision for the return of the capital sum, but one-sixth of the interest derived therefrom was to be used for the objects of the association, whilst the remainder became divisible every three months among the subscribers as cash bonuses of various amounts. These bonuses were to be distributed by lot. It was held that the transaction was a lottery within the meaning of this section.¹⁴ A prize chit transaction, in which the prize winner was ascertained by drawing lots and was under no liability to pay future subscriptions after the prize was won and whose extent of gain depended upon the chance of the draw was held to amount to a lottery.¹⁵ A prize chit was started with the object of creating a fund for a temple. It consisted for 625 subscribers, the monthly subscription being Rs. 3. The number of months for which the subscriptions had to be paid was fifty. The arrangement was that a drawing was to take place every month, one ticket was to be drawn out of 625 tickets and the subscriber who drew the ticket was to be paid Rs. 150 without any liability to pay for future instalments. That process was to be repeated month after month till the fiftieth month. After the fiftieth month the remaining 575 subscribers were to be each paid in a particular order Rs. 150, that is the amount actually paid by them, and the chit fund was to be closed. It was held that the chit fund was a lottery.¹⁶ A cycle and gramophone dealer was conducting a chit transaction in his business premises. There were one hundred subscribers in each section to the chit, each paying a subscription of Rs. 8 per month and the transaction covered a period of twenty months with monthly drawings. The subscriber whose number or name was drawn at one of the monthly drawings was given a specified article and was thereafter relieved of the liability to pay further subscriptions. At the end of the period of twenty months, each of those who had not been successful in the monthly drawings was given the specified article, with the result that those whose numbers or names were drawn earlier derived a far greater benefit than those whose numbers or names were drawn later or were not drawn at all, and the extent of the gain depended upon the chance of the draw. The above-mentioned conditions relating to the chit transactions were also published by him. It was held that the chit transaction amounted to a lottery and the person might rightly be said also to be keeping a place for the purpose of drawing a lottery and, in any view, inasmuch as he published proposals to deliver goods on an event or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of the ticket, lot, or number, he was guilty of an offence under the latter part of this section.¹⁷ Where in a scheme every person who purchased a ticket at the entrance of a show was by so doing contributing to the common fund from which prizes were to be taken and every such purchaser of an entrance ticket had an equal chance to draw back four hundred times as much as he had put in, it was held that the scheme came within the meaning of the word 'lottery'.¹⁸

The circular of the Irish Sweep Stake which was referred to in one of the letters written by or found in the possession of the accused, stated that the Irish Hospital Sweep Stake was expected to reach the huge total of £5,000,000 or seven crores of rupees. The said letter stated that applications should be made with Rs. 7-8-0 per ticket to the accused. The ticket itself contained a proposal for the payment of different sums for the benefit of the holders of such tickets. The money would be divided on each unit of £100,000 as follows. Fifty first prizes of £30,000 or over four lacs of rupees each, fifty second prizes of £15,000 or over two lacs of rupees each, fifty third prizes of £10,000 or over one and a quarter lac of rupees each, 1,200 prizes of Rs. 12,000 to 15,000 each and 5,000 cash prizes of £200 or Rs. 2,750 each. It was held that the case fell within the mischief of this section.¹⁹

Transaction requiring skill for winning prizes is not lottery.—The accused published a newspaper containing an advertisement of a "coupon competition", which was to be carried out by means of coupons, to be filled up by the purchasers of the paper with the names of the horses selected by the purchasers as likely to come in first, second, third and fourth in a race. For every coupon filled up after the first the purchaser paid a penny, and the accused promised a prize of £100 for naming the first four horses correctly. It was held that the transaction did not amount to a lottery.²⁰ The accused published a newspaper containing an offer of a money prize for a correct prediction of the number of births and deaths in London during a named week. Competitors, who were not limited to one prediction, were to fill in the predicted numbers on coupons which were published in the issue of the paper which contained the offer. It was held that the competition, not being one the result of which depended entirely on chance, was not a lottery.²¹ The proprietors of a newspaper published therein an advertisement of a competition for money prizes, the terms of which were that each competitor was to select one of a number of given words and compose a short sentence which defined or illustrated the word selected, the initial letter of each word in the sentence to be a letter occurring in the selected word; that all the sentences reaching the editor of the newspaper should receive careful consideration; and that the decision of the editor as to the prize-winners should be final. It was held that as the competition was one involving some degree of skill on the part of the competitors, and as there was no evidence that the number of competitors was so large as to make it impossible for the sentences to be considered on their merits, the competition was not one the result of which depended entirely on chance, and that it was, therefore, not a lottery.²²

Keeping lottery.—The accused kept an eating house, exhibited placards headed “Great Eastern Money Club”, “White’s Race Club for the Radcliffe Cup”, etc., and sold tickets in respect thereof. Prizes were drawn and the holders of the tickets whose numbers were drawn for prizes received the same, and the accused delivered the prizes to such ticket-holders, but there was no evidence to connect the accused with any drawing by lottery or otherwise for the prizes. It was held that the above evidence was sufficient to support a conviction against the accused of keeping a lottery.²³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused had kept an office or place.

(2) That the office or place was used for the purpose of drawing a lottery.

(3) That such lottery was not authorized by Government.

For the second clause of the section prove—

(1) That the accused published the proposal in question.

(2) That the nature of such proposal was to pay, etc., on an event or contingency as described in the section.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Summary trial.

Where a person is convicted under this section of the offence of using obscene words on a public road to the annoyance of others, an order directing him to enter into a bond under s. 106 of the Criminal Procedure Code cannot be made unless there is a finding that active criminal intimidation or assault has actually occurred in consequence of the obscene abuse.²⁴

Sanction.—No Court shall take cognizance of an offence under this section unless upon a complaint made by order of, or under authority from, Government.²⁵

CHAPTER XV.

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO RELIGION.

"THE principle on which this chapter has been framed is a principle on which it would be desirable that all Governments should act, but from which the British Government in India cannot depart without risking the dissolution of society; it is this, that every man should be suffered to profess his own religion, and that no man should be suffered to insult the religion of another".¹

295. Whoever destroys, damages or defiles any place of worship, or any object held sacred by any class of persons¹ with the intention of thereby insulting the religion of any class of persons² or with the knowledge that any class of persons is likely to consider such destruction, damage or defilement as an insult to their religion, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section punishes the injuring or defiling of a place of worship with intent to insult the religion of a class of persons. Intention is the gist of the offence under it. Mere defilement of a place of worship is not enough.

Ingredients.—This section requires two essentials:—

1. Destruction, damage, or defilement of (a) any place of worship, or (b) any object held sacred by a class of persons.

2. Such destruction, etc., must have been done (i) with the intention of insulting the religion of a class of persons, or (ii) with the knowledge that a class of persons is likely to consider such destruction, etc., as an insult to their religion.

1. 'Whoever destroys, damages or defiles any place of worship, or any object held sacred by any class of persons'.—Any person, whether a worshipper in the place or not, comes within the purview of this section by the use of the word 'whoever'.

'Defiles'.—The word 'defile' is not to be restricted in meaning to acts that would make an object of worship unclean as a material object, but extends to acts done in relation to the object of worship which would render such object ritually impure.² "The words 'destroy' and 'damage' have obviously a physical or material signification, and on the usual principle of construction of ejusdem generis a similar meaning is to be assigned to the word 'defile'. 'Defile' itself is a word of hybrid origin, but the main root 'file', 'foul', is English, and it may ordinarily be understood, especially in collocation with such words as 'destroy' and 'damage', in the primary physical sense".³

This word does not include animate objects according to the Allahabad and the Calcutta High Courts, but refers only to inanimate objects such as churches, mosques, temples and marble or stone figures representing gods.⁴ The killing of a cow by a Mahomedan, within sight of a public road frequented by Hindus, is not punishable under this section.⁵ Where a bull dedicated and set at large at the shradh of a Hindu in accordance with a religious usage was killed by certain Mahomedans secretly and at night in the presence of none but Mahomedans, it was held that no offence was committed.⁶ Similarly, the killing of a cow with the intention or knowledge of offending the religious susceptibilities of Hindus is not an offence under this section.⁷

'Any place of worship, or any object'.—"There is a distinction, not arbitrary, between objects which are objects of respect and even veneration and objects which are held sacred; as an example of the former, I may refer to a place of sepulture not actually consecrated, as in the case of ground specially consecrated for that purpose according to the rites of Christian churches), as distinguished from a place for worship to the deity or where an idol or altar is kept; and such distinction appears to have been kept in view by the Legislature, for while s. 295 deals with the latter class of objects and places, s. 297 deals more especially with trespasses on places of sepulture and places set apart for the performance of funeral rites and as depositories for the remains of the dead".⁸

No particular period is required by law to establish an object as one of religious reverence. The tomb of a saint would become an object of veneration from the date it was built.⁹

The use of a hut on an agricultural land, without the permission of the landlord, as a public mosque with the azan or public call to prayers is entirely unwarranted; and, if the hut is not a mosque but a particular community were only attempting to convert it into one, it is not "a place of worship" under the law.¹⁰

'Any class of persons'.—This expression may include any religious sect however small in number. The application of this section is not limited only as between those who follow different religions. It also applies to different sects or classes of Hindus who are animated by sectarian feelings.¹¹ A complainant and his family do not form a "class of persons" within the meaning of this section. Four accused entered the premises of the complainant and only one of them demolished the wall which he was constructing and took a deity, that was worshipped by the complainant and his family, from a niche and threw it into a drain, it was held that the complainant and his family members could not constitute a class of persons within the meaning of this section but the accused could be convicted under s. 297.¹²

2. 'With the intention of thereby insulting the religion of any class of persons'.—The authors of the Code say: "The question whether insults offered to a religion ought to be visited with punishment does not appear to us at all to depend on the question whether that religion be true or false. The religion may be false, but the pain which such insults give to the professors of that religion is real. It is often, as the most superficial observation may convince us, as real a pain and as acute a pain as is caused by almost any offence against the person, against property or against character. Nor is there any compensating good whatsoever to be set off against this pain. Discussion, indeed, tends to elicit truth; but insults have no such tendency; they can be employed just as easily against the purest faith as against the most monstrous superstition. It is easier to argue against falsehood than against truth; but it is as easy to pull down or defile the temples of truth as those of falsehood; it is as easy to molest with ribaldry and clamour men assembled for purposes of pious and rational worship, as men engaged in the most absurd ceremonies. Such insults, when directed against erroneous opinions, seldom have any other effect than to fix those opinions deeper, and to give a character of peculiar ferocity to theological dissension: instead of eliciting truth they only inflame fanaticism.

"All these considerations apply with peculiar force to India. There is perhaps no country in which the Government has so much to apprehend from religious excitement among the people. The Christians are numerically a very small minority of the population, and in possession of all the highest posts in the Government, in the tribunals and in the army. Under their rule are placed millions of Mahomedans, of differing sects, but all strongly attached to the fundamental articles of the Mahomedan creed, and tens of millions of Hindoos, strongly attached to doctrines and rites which Christians and Mahomedans join in reprobating. Such a state of things is pregnant with dangers which can only be averted by a firm adherence to the true principles of toleration. On those principles the British Government has hitherto acted with eminent judgment, and with no less eminent success; and on those principles we propose to frame this part of the Penal Code".¹³

Under this section it must be distinctly proved that there was an intention on the part of the accused to insult the religion of a class of persons. This intention could be ascertained from the nature of the act done. Where there is no intention to wound the religious susceptibilities there will be no offence. Where a person, as the result of a quarrel with a relation, threw a basket containing cooked food (fowl, fish, rice etc.) into a well and without any intention of wounding the religious susceptibilities of anyone, he was held not to have committed an offence under this section.¹⁴ The accused (Hindus) were charged under this section, in that they removed some old building materials belonging to a mosque, and thereby insulted the religious feelings of Mahomedans. It was held that there was no reason to believe that the accused in acting as they did, had any intention of insulting the religion of the Mahomedan residents of the village, or that they did so even with the knowledge that any class of persons was likely to consider the removal of the materials an insult to their religion.¹⁵ Where a Hindu had sexual intercourse with a woman secretly and at night within an enclosure surrounding the tomb of a Mahomedan fakir, it was held that he had committed an offence under s. 297 and not under this section.¹⁶ Where the accused, a goldsmith by caste, performed certain ceremony by pouring cocoanut water over the idol of god Siva, it was held that if the temple in which the ceremony was performed was one of a class in which the worshippers were not allowed to touch the idol or pour cocoanut water on it, except through persons specially appointed for the purpose, and bound to observe certain special rules, and if the accused performed the ceremony with the object of ridiculing openly the established rule, a conviction under this section might be supported.¹⁷ The presence of Moothans, a sub-caste of Sudras whose status is equal to that of Nairs, in such portions of a Hindu temple as are open to non-Brahmins is not a 'defilement' within the meaning of this section.¹⁸ The entry of a Mahar into a temple and his touching the idol do not amount to defilement under this section.¹⁹ Where the accused destroyed the sacred thread worn by the complainant, who was an Ahir and therefore not entitled to wear it, it was held that this did not amount to an insult to the complainant's religion under this section or s. 295A.²⁰

Place of worship.—A kyaung is a place of worship.²¹ Where the accused, who were of low caste, entered into the precincts of a temple, it was held that unless there was an intention to insult the religion of a class of persons they could not be convicted of an offence under this section.²²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the place was one of worship or that the object was a sacred one.

(2) That the same was held sacred by a class of persons.

(3) That the accused destroyed, damaged, or defiled the same.

(4) That he did so (a) with the intention of thereby insulting the religion of a class of persons; or (b) with the knowledge that a class of persons is likely to consider such destruction, etc., as an insult to their religion.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class.

Charge—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, destroyed (or damaged or defiled) a certain place of worship, to wit——, [or a certain object, to wit——,] held sacred by (specify the class of persons) with the intention of thereby insulting the religion of (specify the class of persons insulted) [or with the knowledge, etc.]; and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 295 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

295A. Whoever,¹ with deliberate and malicious intention² of outraging the religious feelings³ of any class⁴ of His Majesty's subjects, by words, either spoken or written,⁵ or by visible representations⁶ insults or attempts⁷ to insult the religion or the religious beliefs⁸ of that class, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Deliberate and malicious acts intended to outrage religious feelings of any class by insulting its religion or religious beliefs.

COMMENT.

This section was introduced by the Criminal Law Amendment Act (XXV of 1927), s. 2, owing to the agitation following the decision of the Lahore High Court in the notorious Rangila Rasul case²³ in which it was held that s. 153A was not meant to stop polemics against a deceased religious leader however scurrilous and in bad taste such attacks might be. But in a subsequent case, known as the Risala-i-Vartman case,²⁴ in which this decision has not been referred to, it was decided that a scurrilous, vituperative, and foul attack on a religion or on its founder would come within the purview of s. 153A. The Rangila Rasul case was expressly dissented from in *Kali Charan Sharma v. King Emperor*²⁵ in which it was held that the book entitled "Vichitra Jivan" depicting the life of the Prophet Mohammed promoted feelings of enmity between Hindus and Mahomedans. The Legislature has enacted a special provision dealing with such offences. See Comment on s. 153A, supra.

The offence under this section is more serious than the one under s. 298. The prosecution must establish that the intention of the accused to outrage was malicious as well as deliberate, and directed to a class of persons and not merely to an individual. What is punishable under this section is not so much the matter of discourse, written or spoken, as the manner of it. If the words used caused persons to feel insulted but were only such as might possibly wound and in fact did so, then there is no offence under this section; if the words used were bound to be regarded by any reasonable man as grossly offensive and provocative, and were maliciously intended to be regarded as such, then an offence is committed. And it is no defence to a charge under this section for any one merely to say that he was writing a pamphlet in reply to one written by an adherent of another religion who has attacked his own religion. Prior to the enactment of this section, if the words were written, s. 298 had no application and recourse was held to s. 153A. If the intention of the accused is to wound the feelings of an individual orally by words or sound or gesture or by placing some object in the sight of such individual the offence falls under s. 298, and it is no defence for the accused to say that he did so in order to call attention to some matter in need of reform, as this is not the proper way to secure reform.¹

Object.—In the Statement of Objects and Reasons it was stated: "The prevalence of malicious writings intended to insult the religion or outrage the religious feelings of various classes of His Majesty's subjects has made it necessary to examine the existing provisions of the law with a view to seeing whether they require to be strengthened. Chapter XV of the Indian Penal Code, which deals with offences relating to religion, provides no penalty in respect of writings of the kind described above. Such writings can usually be dealt with under s. 153A of the Indian Penal Code as it is seldom that they do not represent an attempt to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes. It must be recognized, however, that this is only an indirect way of dealing with acts which may properly be made punishable themselves, apart from the question whether they have the further effect of promoting feelings of enmity or hatred between classes. Accordingly it is proposed to insert a new section in Chapter XV of the Indian Penal Code, with the object of making it a specific offence intentionally to insult or attempted to insult the religion or outrage or attempt to outrage the religious feelings of any class of His Majesty's subjects".²

Scope.—This section has no retrospective effect, but if a new edition of a book, which was published before the enactment of that section, is published after its enactment, the author of the book can be convicted under this section if his connection with the publisher is established.³

1. 'Whoever'.—See Comment on s. 124, supra.

2. 'Deliberate and malicious intention'.—See Comment on s. 298 as to the meaning of 'deliberate intention'.

The word 'maliciously' is used in s. 219, supra. See Comment on that section.

The Select Committee in their report stated that the essence of the offence is "that the insult to religion or the outrage to religious feelings must be the sole, or primary, or at least the deliberate and conscious intention. We have accordingly decided to adopt the phraseology of section 298 which requires deliberate intention in order to constitute the offence with which it deals".⁴

"Further, we were impressed by an argument to the effect that an insult to a religion or to the religious beliefs of the followers of a religion might be inflicted in good faith by a writer with the object of facilitating some measure of social reform by administering such a shock to the followers of the religion as would ensure notice being taken of any criticism so made. We have therefore amplified the words 'with deliberate intention' by inserting reference to malice, and we think that the section which we have now evolved will be both comprehensive and at the same time of not too wide an application".⁵

3. 'Outraging the religious feelings'.—Section 298 uses the word 'wounding': this section uses the word 'outraging'. 'Outraging' is a much stronger word than 'wounding'. In Murray's Dictionary 'outrage' is explained as "to wrong grossly, treat with gross violence or indignity". The Select Committee in their report stated: "We think that to penalise even an intentional outrage or attempted outrage upon the religious feelings of any class would be casting the net too wide for the cases with particular reference to which the Bill has been introduced. At the same time, we realize that the reference to the outraging of religious feelings was inserted to provide for the case of an insult to the founder of a religion or a person held sacred by the followers of a particular religion where such an outrage does not amount to an insult of the religion. It has in one instance been held that an insult to the founder of a religion is not necessarily an insult to the religion although it may outrage the religious feelings of the followers of that religion. We have therefore provided that the new section shall only apply in cases where a religion is insulted with the deliberate intention of outraging the religious feelings of its followers".⁶

To attribute to the Mahomedan religion the teachings of the doctrine of Dawood, a heretic, is insulting to that religion, and if done, deliberately and maliciously, would fall under s. 295A. There is a further reference to God, who, according to the Mahomedan religion, is a celibate, having given permission to Mahomedan males to have as many as four wives to boot and have as many non-Mahomedan women as they like and other liberties with regard to women. I agree with the Sessions Judge as regarding this as insulting to the Mahomedan religion and if the insult is malicious and deliberate with the intention of outraging the feelings of Mahomedans the publication would be an offence under s. 295A".⁸

Power to prevent religious disorders.—Under s. 42 (1) of the Bombay District Police Act (Bom. Act IV of 1890) the District Magistrate or First Class Magistrate has power to stop harangues or dissemination of pictures, symbols, mimic representations which may inflame religious animosity or hostility between different classes. Under the City of Bombay Police Act (Bom. Act IV of 1902), s. 23 (2) (c), the Commissioner of Police is invested with similar powers.

Confiscation.—The Provincial Government is empowered under s. 99A, Criminal Procedure Code, to forfeit any newspaper, book, or document which is deliberately and maliciously intended to outrage the religious feelings of any class of His Majesty's subjects by insulting the religion or the religious beliefs of that class.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused spoke or wrote the words or made the visible representations.

As to evidence of publication see Comment on s. 124A.

(2) That the accused thereby insulted or attempted to insult the religion or the religious beliefs of a class of His Majesty's subjects.

(3) That the accused did so with the deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of that class.⁹

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session or Presidency Magistrate.

The Select Committee in their report stated: "We desire to observe that by the reference to a Court of Session we mean a Court of Session sitting with assessors."¹⁰

Sanction.—Sanction of Government is necessary for prosecution under this section.¹¹ The Select Committee in their report stated: "We are of opinion that a provision requiring the sanction of Government to the institution of a prosecution under this section is necessary in order to avoid fictitious or vindictive proceedings which would not be likely to result in a conviction".¹²

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, by writing (or speaking) the words (mention them) (or by visible representations, viz.—) insulted (or attempted to insult) the religion (or the religious beliefs) of a class of His Majesty's subjects, to wit—, with the deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of that class, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 295A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (when tried by a Presidency Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

296. Whoever voluntarily causes disturbance to any assembly¹ lawfully engaged in the performance of religious worship,² or religious ceremonies, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Disturbing religious assembly.

COMMENT.

Assemblies held for religious worship, or for the performance of religious ceremonies, are hereby protected from intentional disturbance.

Ingredients.—The section has the following essentials:—

1. Causing of disturbance voluntarily.
2. The disturbance must be caused to an assembly lawfully engaged in religious worship or religious ceremonies.

1. 'Voluntarily causes disturbance to any assembly'.—See s. 39, supra, as to the meaning of the word 'voluntarily'. Under this section proof of intention is unnecessary, as the Code supposes an intention to insult, if the disturbance, in fact, follow immediately as the result of the offender's act. Assemblies lawfully engaged in the performance of religious worship or religious ceremonies are hereby protected from voluntary disturbance and insult, be that religion true or false.

To constitute a 'disturbance' within the meaning of this section, a religious service need neither be stopped nor actually prevented from being carried on; nor need a religious assembly be really disturbed.¹³ The word 'disturb' means 'molest' or 'vex'. Peaceful worship must not be interfered with. Where one party could hear little or nothing of what the other recited, it was held that no disturbance "was caused within the meaning of this section".¹⁴ Where the accused spread false rumours which caused a religious procession to come to an end, it was held that they could not be convicted of causing disturbance within the meaning of this section.¹⁵

Mere playing of music before a mosque cannot amount to an offence under this section though a deliberate intention to disturb may not be necessary. Before that section could apply it must be found as a fact that there was a substantial and not merely fanciful disturbance of the worship.¹⁶

'Assembly'.—For the purpose of this section three persons gathering together for purposes of worship are sufficient to constitute an assembly.¹⁷

2. 'Lawfully engaged in the performance of religious worship'.—The assembly must have been lawfully engaged in the performance of such worship or ceremonies, i.e., they must be doing what they have a right to do.¹⁸ If the ceremony is commenced by an act which is not lawful, it cannot be said that the persons engaged in it are lawfully engaged from the mere circumstance of their falling into a posture of worship though such worship may be real.¹⁹

A religious assembly held in a public street, or thoroughfare, so as to cause obstruction, cannot be said to be "lawfully engaged" within the meaning of this section. In a full bench case of the Madras High Court²⁰ Subrahmania Ayyar, J., has observed that the object of this section presumably is to secure freedom from molestation when people meet for the performance of acts in a quiet spot vested for the time in the assemblies exclusively; and not when they engage in worship in an unquiet place open to all the public as a thoroughfare. The user of a highway for religious worship is altogether wanting in lawfulness. Bhashyam Ayyangar, J., expressed the same opinion. But Davies and Benson, JJ., while agreeing that no disturbance was caused by the accused in the case before them, did not share the same view as Subrahmania Ayyar and Bhashyam Ayyangar, JJ., did, as to the lawfulness of religious worship on the highway. The former Chief Court of the Punjab adopted the view of Subrahmania Ayyar and Bhashyam Ayyangar, JJ. Where some boys were beating drums to summon people for joining a Moharram procession and on being asked by the accused, whose horse was frightened, they did not stop, and the accused then seized the drums, but restored them the next day, it was held that the accused's acts did not constitute an offence under this section, inasmuch as no assembly could be "lawfully engaged" within the meaning of this section on a highway.²¹ But where certain Lodhas, who, with the sanction of the public authorities, had been carrying flags to a temple in procession through a public street were attacked by persons who objected to the procession, it was held that such attack constituted a disturbance to the performance of a religious ceremony.²² Where some Muhammadans took a tazia procession through a private grove as a result of which a dispute ensued between Hindus and Muhammadans and the accused were convicted of an offence under this section, and it appeared that the Muhammadans had not established any right to take the tazia through the grove, it was held that no offence under this section was committed.²³

The worship must be a real worship and not a cloak for doing something else, and the assembly must be lawfully engaged in worship.²⁴

CASES.

Disturbance caused by saying 'amin'.—A mosque was used by members of a sect of Mahomedans called the Hanifis, according to whose tenets the word 'amin' (amen) should be spoken in a low tone of voice. While the Hanifis were at prayers, R, a Mahomedan of another sect, entered the mosque, and in the course of the prayers according to the tenets of his sect, called out "amin" in a loud tone of voice. For this act he was convicted of voluntarily disturbing an assembly engaged in religious worship under this section. The Allahabad High Court ordered the case to be retried.²⁵ But in a subsequent case it was held that a mosque is a place where all sects of Mahomedans are entitled to go and perform their devotions as of right, according to their conscience; and a Mahomedan pronouncing the word 'amin' loudly, in the honest exercise of conscience, commits no offence or civil wrong,¹ though he may by such conduct cause annoyance to his fellow-worshippers in the mosque.² Any person, Mahomedan or not, who goes into a mosque not bona fide for a religious purpose but mala fide, for the purpose of disturbing others engaged in their devotions, will render himself criminally liable.³

Disturbance caused by saying 'mantra'.—Where the worshippers were reciting one mantram (precept from a religious work) and the accused recited another mantram in their presence and hearing, so as to distract the minds of the former from the act in which they were engaged, it was held that the act of the accused amounted to a disturbance of religious worship within the meaning of this section. To constitute the offence, it is not necessary that there should be an actual stay or interruption of the service.⁴

Disturbance caused by music.—Where the accused passed in a procession before a mosque with music while religious worship was going on between certain hours which, to the knowledge of the accused, were fixed for such worship by the District Magistrate, it was held that the accused by their action disturbed the worship and were guilty under this section, and that it was not necessary that the accused should have an active intention to disturb religious worship, if knowing they were likely to disturb it by their music they took the risk and did actually cause disturbance.⁵

English case.—Where in a contest for situation of a clerk to a meeting house, one clerk pulled the other from the desk, it was held to be a disturbance, although the statute prohibiting disturbance was intended principally to apply to persons who would oppose a form of worship inconsistent with their own tenets.⁶

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the existence of the assembly in question.

(2) That such assembly was, at the time of the offence, engaged in performing religious worship or ceremony.

(3) That the assembly being engaged in such performance was lawful.

(4) That the accused caused disturbance of such assembly when so engaged.

(5) That the accused did as above voluntarily.

It is not necessary that the accused should have had an active intention to disturb religious worship. If he knew that he was likely to disturb it, it is sufficient.⁷

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency or first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, voluntarily caused disturbance to an assembly, to wit—, lawfully engaged in the performance of religious worship (or religious ceremonies) ; and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 296 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

297. Whoever, with the intention of wounding the feelings of any person, or of insulting the religion of any person, or with the knowledge¹ that the feelings of any person are likely to be wounded, or that the religion of any person is likely to be insulted² thereby, commits any trespass³ in any place of worship⁴ or on any place of sepulture,⁵ or any place set apart for the performance of funeral rites⁶ or as a depository for the remains of the dead, or offers any indignity to any human corpse,⁷ or causes disturbance to any persons assembled for the performance of funeral ceremonies,⁸ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

Object.—The section deals more especially with trespasses on places of sepulture and places set apart for the performance of funeral rites and as depositories for the remains of the dead. It extends the principle laid down in s. 295 to places which are treated as sacred.

The offence at which it strikes is intimately bound up with the commission of a trespass or, subject to that, of deliberately offering an indignity to a corpse or causing disturbance to a body of persons assembled for religious purpose.⁸

1. 'Intention . . . knowledge'.—The essence of this section is an intention, or knowledge of likelihood, to wound feelings or insult religion, and when with that intention or knowledge trespass on a place or sepulture, indignity to a corpse, or disturbance to persons assembled for funeral ceremonies, is committed, the offence is complete.⁹ Where owing to a dispute between the parties a delay occurred in digging a grave, and the corpse was not present, it was held that this section was not applicable.¹⁰ The section "does not make an act committed in defiance of it an offence when that act is committed with the intention of wounding the feelings of any person ; it is equally an offence if committed with the knowledge that the feelings of any person are likely to be wounded or the religion of any person is likely to be insulted thereby."¹¹ Persons who entered upon a burial place and ploughed up the graves were held to have committed an offence under this section, notwithstanding that their entry on the land was by the consent of the owner thereof.¹² Where the accused, who formed part of a committee whose duty it was to collect subscriptions to defray the cost of erecting a wall round a cemetery, stopped a corpse at the gate and demanded a fee before admitting it into the cemetery, and some discussion ensued during which the corpse was placed on the ground, but the party bearing the corpse were then admitted without payment, it was held that there was no indignity within the meaning of this section.¹³ Four co-owners of a plot of land used to bury their dead in that land. Two of them opened a saw-pit close to the graves of a third co-owner's relatives but did not disturb any of the graves. It was held that they had not committed any offence under this section.¹⁴

This section refers to "feelings" but not to "religious feelings". The kind of "feelings" which comes within the section is clearly limited in its nature by the second paragraph to the section by reference to a place of worship, to a place of sepulture, to feelings of a spiritual rather than a material nature, feelings associated with such sacred places. It does not punish acts which are merely of earthly vanity or pride. Section 298 expressly refers to "religious feelings."¹⁵

2. 'Likely to be insulted.'—An act which is done with the knowledge that a person is likely to consider that act as an insult to his religion, is an act by which 'religion is likely' to be insulted within the meaning of this section.

3. 'Commits any trespass.'—The word 'trespass' here implies not merely criminal trespass as defined in s. 441, but also an ordinary act of trespass, i.e., an entry on another's land without lawful authority with the intention specified in the section. The Allahabad High Court has laid down in two cases that the word 'trespass' in this section has not the same meaning as that in the expression 'criminal trespass' defined in s. 441. Knox, J., in a case said: "...I am not prepared to construe the word 'trespass' in the present section as it is defined in the case of criminal trespass under the Penal Code. In a section of this kind I see no reason for restricting the original meaning of the word, which covered any injury or offence done, and to couple it with entry upon property."¹⁶ The Calcutta High Court has similarly observed that the word 'trespass' in this section means "any violent or injurious act committed in such place and with such knowledge or intention as is defined in that section."¹⁷ Although a person may have obtained a decree for khas possession in respect of a piece of land and placed in possession thereof by the civil Court, if he damages structures erected over graves standing thereon and thereby wounds the feelings of the relatives of those buried, he commits the offence of trespass within the meaning of this section.¹⁸

In a case before the former Chief Court of the Punjab one Judge expressed his agreement with the Allahabad and Calcutta view, but another Judge did not agree with it.¹⁹ The Bombay High Court has laid down that the 'trespass' contemplated in this section is such a trespass as is defined in s. 441.²⁰

The Rangoon High Court has held that the word 'trespass' means any violent or injurious act committed in such place and with such knowledge or intention as is defined in this section. The accused, who had gone to the mosque for prayers, was asked, after the service, by some others why he had on former occasions abused the Moulvi and the congregation, and on his denial, an altercation ensued, when the accused abused all and sundry employing obscene epithets and threats. It was held that in order to convict the accused, it must be proved that he, with the intention of wounding the feelings of the Moulvi and the congregation, remained unlawfully within the mosque with intent thereby to insult or annoy them and that on the facts a conviction under this section was wrong.²¹

Where a joint owner of property entered into a grove for the purpose of demarcating his share and in doing so dug up certain graves, and exposed the bones of the persons buried in spite of the remonstrances of the relations of the buried persons, it was held that he had committed an offence under this section.²² Similarly, the erection of a shed over a visible grave belonging to the complainant's family in a dis-used grave-yard claimed to be private property of the trespasser, with the knowledge that the feelings of the complainant would be likely to be thereby wounded, was held to be an offence under this section.²³ The accused dug up and levelled certain graves existing on a plot of land which had been sold to him by the mujawars of an adjoining shrine whose names appeared as owners in the revenue records. The relatives of the persons buried in those graves prosecuted the accused. It was held that he was guilty under this section for the act of a person who destroyed or disturbed a place of sepulture with the intention of wounding the feelings of any person or with the knowledge that the feelings of any person were likely to be wounded was wrongful and amounted to a trespass, no matter whether the land in which the place of sepulture was included did or did not belong to such person.²⁴

4. 'Any place of worship.'—The trespass must be in a place of religious worship with the knowledge that the feelings of persons would be wounded thereby.²⁵ Where a mahar, a low caste man, entered into a temple, he was held guilty of an offence under this section.¹ A Hindu, who had sexual intercourse with a woman within an enclosure surrounding the tomb of a Mahomedan fakir was convicted under s. 295. It was held that in the absence of proof that the place was used for worship or otherwise held sacred, the conviction was bad, and that it should be altered to a conviction under this section.² Persons having sexual connection inside a mosque were held guilty of an offence under this section.³

Four accused entered the premises of the complainant and one of them demolished the wall which he was constructing and took a deity which was worshipped by the complainant and his family from the niche and threw it into a drain. It was held that the accused were guilty under this section.⁴

5. 'Any place of sepulture.'—Trespass on any place of sepulture comes within the purview of this section. But where there have been only a few isolated and secret cases of burial in the course of many years on a piece of property, that would not be enough to constitute it a place of sepulture.

6. 'Place set apart for the performance of funeral rites.'—The section contemplates disturbance of persons engaged in performing funeral ceremonies. Obstruction to the performance of obsequies comes under this section.⁵ But a Moharram procession is not a funeral ceremony within the meaning of this section.⁶

7. 'Offers any indignity to any human corpse.'—Where certain persons were convicted of having offered an indignity to a human corpse, inasmuch as they had by using their influence prevented the grave-diggers from digging a grave for the corpse of the complainant's son, on account of the complainant not having joined the Khilafat party, it was held that the accused had not committed any criminal offence. Stuart, J., observed: "I do not propose to expatiate upon the mentality of persons who, to support their views as to what they conceive desirable in politics, use their influence to prevent a man from burying his little child. But as the law stands they have not committed any criminal offence in this particular case. The act was an act of boycotting and was not a criminal act either under the Penal Code or any other law."⁷

8. 'Causes disturbance to any persons, etc.'—The word 'disturbance' implies some active interference in, or hindrance to, the performance of the funeral ceremonies. The grand-daughter-in-law of the complainant having died, the complainant and his relations took the body out to the cremation ground and were preparing to cremate it when the accused came there and asked them not to cremate the body, and on being asked why, said that they would state the reason to the police. It was held that the mere utterance of the words "do not cremate the body", unaccompanied by any attempt to prevent the cremation or by any manifestation on the part of the accused of their intention to interfere if the complainant and his relations should persist in having the body cremated, could not be regarded as a disturbance to the persons assembled for the performance of the funeral ceremonies within the meaning of this section.⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the place in question was (a) a place of worship; or (b) a place of burial, etc.

(2) That the accused committed trespass therein.

(3) That he did so (i) intending thereby to wound the feelings of some person, or to insult the religion of some person; or (ii) with the knowledge that the feelings of some person would be likely to be wounded thereby, or that the religion of some person would be likely to be insulted thereby.

Or prove the following points :—

(1) The existence of the human corpse.

(2) That the accused offered any indignity thereto.

(3) That he, when offering such indignity, intended or knew, etc., as in (3) above.

Or prove the following points :—

(1) That persons were assembled for performing funeral ceremonies.

(2) That the accused caused disturbance to such persons when assembled.

(3) That he did so intending thereby, or knowing, etc., as in (3) above.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, or first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, with the intention of wounding the feelings of— (or of insulting the religion of—) [or with the knowledge that the feelings of— are likely to be wounded (or that the religion of— is likely to be insulted thereby)] committed a trespass in a place of worship, to wit—, (or on a place of sepulture, to wit—, or etc.), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 297 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

298. Whoever, with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings¹ of any person, utters any word or makes any sound in the hearing of that person or makes any gesture in the sight of that person or places any object in the sight of that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Uttering words, etc., with deliberate intent to wound religious feelings.

COMMENT.

Object.—The authors of the Code say : “In framing clause 282 (this section), we had two objects in view; we wish to allow all fair latitude to religious discussion, and at the same time to prevent the professors of any religion from offering, under the pretext of such discussion, intentional insults to what is held sacred by others. We do not conceive that any person can be justified in wounding with deliberate intention the religious feelings of his neighbours by words, gesture or exhibitions. A warm expression dropped in the heat of controversy, or an argument urged by a person, not for the purpose of insulting and annoying the professors of a different creed, but in good faith for the purpose of vindicating his own, will not fall under the definition contained in this clause.”⁹

Scope.—This section is much wider than s. 295 and includes any action which is known to wound the religious feelings of others.¹⁰

⁹ Note J, p. 137.

¹⁰ Mir Chhittan, [1936] A. L. J. R. 1197, 38 Cr. L. J. 202, [1937] AIR (A) 13.

1. 'Deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings.'—The Law Commissioners observe: "The intention to wound must be deliberate, that is, not conceived on the sudden in the course of discussion, but premeditated; it must appear, not only that the party, being engaged in a discussion with another on the subject of the religion professed by that other, in the course of the argument consciously used words likely to wound his religious feelings, but that he entered into the discussion with the deliberate purpose of so offending him. In other places in the Code a party is held to be guilty if he causes a certain effect the causing of which is an offence, intending to cause that effect, or knowing that his act was likely to cause it. Here there is a marked difference. Although the party uttering offensive words might be conscious at the moment of uttering them that they were likely to wound the feelings of his auditors, yet if it were apparent that he uttered them on the spur of the occasion, in good faith, simply to further his argument—that he did not take advantage of the occasion to utter them in pursuance of a deliberate purpose to offend—he would not, we think, be liable to conviction under Clause 282 (this section). If however a party were to force himself upon the attention of another, addressing to him, an involuntary hearer, an insulting invective against his religion, he would, we conceive, fall under the definition, for the reasonable inference from his conduct would be that he had a deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of his hearer."¹¹

"We are, though not without hesitation, inclined to think that in the very peculiar circumstances of this country, discourse addressed to any person with the intention of converting him from the faith he professes, which, however it may wound his religious feelings, is not couched in insulting language, nor forced upon him in an insulting manner, should not be considered a crime."¹²

"In England an attempt to convert any one from the religion of the country by the most gentle and dispassionate address, is by law an offence; to attempt the same thing by contemptuous or vituperative language is an offence which would be severely punished in practice. But the reason is that conversion is not recognised as a legitimate object. The law assumes the truth of Christianity. But it is manifest that the Law and the Legislature of this country cannot assume the truth of any religion. And, as free discussion, or, in other words, attempts at conversion, is the best criterion of the truth of any thing the truth or falsehood of which is not already assumed by law to be beyond controversy, it seems to follow that a bona fide attempt to convert ought not in this country to be treated as a crime, even though the intention to convert be an intention to do so by wounding the religious feelings of the persons addressed. We apprehend it is almost impossible to convert a sincere or ardent votary of any faith without wounding his religious feelings in the early stages of the process."¹³

Deliberate intention of the accused may be inferred from his words as well as from his acts.

C A S E S .

Deliberate intention to wound religious feelings.—Interpolation of a forbidden chant.—Interpolation of a forbidden chant in an authorized ritual is an offence under this section.¹⁴

Killing cow or exhibiting cow's flesh.—Killing of a cow in the presence of Hindus¹⁵ or exhibiting cow's flesh by carrying it in an uncovered state round a village,¹⁶ with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of Hindus, is an offence under this section. Where there is no deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of Hindus, no offence is committed under this section.¹⁷ But it has been held that the religious feelings of Mahomedans are not wounded by the slaughter of goats by jhatka and exposing the carcass outside or selling its flesh inside a shop, as Mahomedans do not worship goats.¹⁸

No offence if religious feelings not wounded.—Swearing on cow's flesh.—Where the accused, while his caste-people were sitting to dine at the complainant's house, called out in the hearing of all that they would be eating cow's flesh if they took food without them, which made them leave their dishes untouched, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section¹⁹

Wilful pollution of food served at caste dinner.—Where certain Hindus present at a caste dinner had sat down to partake of the food which had been served to them, when certain other members of the caste came, and after telling those who were seated to move to another place, which they refused to do, threw down a shoe amongst the men who were seated, and who in consequence left the food untouched, it was held that the persons who threw the shoe could not be convicted under this section.²⁰ This decision does not seem to be satisfactory. The authors of the Code have said that "the rendering the food of a Hindoo useless to him by causing it to be in what he considers as a polluted state is an injury"²¹ necessitating punishment.

Throwing of dirty clothes.—Where a woman threw a cloth, which she had been wearing at the time of her confinement after having given birth to an illegitimate child, on a person whom she alleged to be its father, it was held that that did not amount to an offence under this section as it deals with offences relating to religion and not to castes.²²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused uttered the words, or made the gesture, etc.

(2) That he did so, intending to wound the religious feelings of any person.

(3) That such intention was deliberate.

To hold a person liable under this section the intention with which the words were uttered must be strictly proved; and it is not sufficient to show that the utterer knew that his act was likely to wound the religious feelings of any body.²³

"...it is not sufficient for conviction that a person should do one of the acts described with the knowledge that he is thereby likely to wound the religious feelings of any person, nor even that he should do it with that intention, unless the intention be deliberate."²⁴

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable—Triable by Magistrate, Presidency, or first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, uttered the word (specify it) in the hearing of— [or made a sound, to wit—, in the hearing of—; or made a gesture, to wit—, in the sight of—; or placed a certain object, to wit—, in the sight of—] with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of the said person, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 298 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

Of Offences affecting Life.

299. Whoever causes death¹ by doing an act² with the intention of causing death,³ or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death,⁴ or with the knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death,⁵ commits the offence of culpable homicide.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A lays sticks and turf over a pit, with the intention of thereby causing death, or with the knowledge that death is likely to be thereby caused. Z, believing the ground to be firm, treads on it, falls in and is killed. A has committed the offence of culpable homicide.

(b) A knows Z to be behind a bush. B does not know it. A, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely to cause Z's death, induces B to fire at the bush. B fires and kills Z. Here B may be guilty of no offence; but A has committed the offence of culpable homicide.

(c) A, by shooting at a fowl with intent to kill and steal it, kills B, who is behind a bush; A not knowing that he was there. Here, although A was doing an unlawful act, he was not guilty of culpable homicide, as he did not intend to kill B or cause death by doing an act that he knew was likely to cause death.

Explanation 1.⁶—A person who causes bodily injury to another who is labouring under a disorder, disease or bodily infirmity, and thereby accelerates the death of that other, shall be deemed to have caused his death.

Explanation 2.⁷—Where death is caused by bodily injury, the person who causes such bodily injury shall be deemed to have caused the death, although by resorting to proper remedies and skilful treatment the death might have been prevented.

Explanation 3.⁸—The causing of the death of a child in the mother's womb is not homicide. But it may amount to culpable homicide to cause the death of a living child, if any part of that child has been brought forth, though the child may not have breathed or been completely born.

COMMENT.

This section defines culpable homicide as the act of causing death (1) with the intention of (a) causing death, or (b) causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, or (2) with the knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death.

The first and second clauses of the section refer to intention apart from knowledge and the third clause refers to knowledge apart from intention. Knowledge and intention must not be confused.¹

Homicide.—Homicide is the killing of a human being by a human being.² It is either (A) lawful, or (B) unlawful.

Lawful homicide, or simple homicide, includes several cases falling under the General Exceptions (Chapter IV).

Unlawful homicide includes (1) culpable homicide not amounting to murder; (2) murder (s. 300); rash or negligent homicide (s. 304A); and (4) suicide (ss. 305, 306).

(A) Lawful or simple homicide.—This may be divided into two classes—

1. Excusable homicide.—This class includes the following cases:—

(1) Where the death is caused by accident or misfortune, and without any criminal intention or knowledge in the doing of a lawful act, in a lawful manner, by lawful means, and with proper care and caution (s. 80).

(2) Where the death is caused by a child, or a person of unsound mind, or an intoxicated person, as will come under ss. 82, 83, 84 and 85.

(3) Where the death is caused unintentionally by an act done in good faith for the benefit of the person killed, when

(i) he or, if a minor or lunatic, his guardian has expressly or impliedly consented to such an act (ss. 87, 88), or

(ii) where it is impossible for the person killed to signify his consent, or where he is incapable of giving consent, and has no guardian from whom it is possible to obtain consent in time for the thing to be done with benefit (s. 92).

All the above cases are dealt with in the Chapter of General Exceptions.

2. Justifiable homicide.—This class includes cases where the death is caused—

(1) By a person, who is bound, or by a mistake of fact, in good faith, believes himself bound, by law (s. 76).

(2) By a Judge when acting judicially in the exercise of any power which is, or which in good faith he believes to be, given him by law (s. 77).

(3) By a person acting in pursuance of the judgment or order of a Court of Justice (s. 78).

(4) By a person who is justified or who by reason of a mistake of fact, in good faith, believes himself to be justified by law (s. 79).

(5) By a person acting without any criminal intention to cause harm, and in good faith, for the purpose of preventing or avoiding other harm to person or property (s. 81).

(6) Where the death is caused in exercising the right of private defence of person or property (ss. 100, 103).

(B) Unlawful homicide.—Culpable homicide is the first kind of unlawful homicide. It is the causing of death by doing—

(i) an act with the intention of causing death;

(ii) an act with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death; or

(iii) an act with the knowledge that the act was likely to cause death.

Without one or other of these elements an act, though it may be in its nature criminal and may occasion death, will not amount to the offence of culpable homicide.³

The existence of an evil motive is not at all necessary. Malice is not made a necessary ingredient of the definition. Whatever may be the motive which incites the action and whether or not any motive whatsoever be discoverable, if the act falls within any of the above elements, and none of the General Exceptions (Chapter IV) is applicable, it is culpable homicide.

English law.—Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of another without malice aforethought, express or implied. It is of two kinds: (1) Voluntary; (2) Involuntary.

(1) Voluntary manslaughter: where a man greatly provokes another, and the other kills him; or where, upon a sudden quarrel, two persons fight and one of them kills the other.

These two cases are met with by Exceptions (1) and (4) to s. 300.

(2) Involuntary manslaughter: where death is caused by accident in doing an unlawful act not amounting to felony; or where death is caused by culpable neglect, i.e. while doing a lawful act in an unlawful manner.

The first case will not be culpable homicide under the Code as will appear from ill. (e) to this section; and the second case is separately provided for by s. 304A.

Under the English law, it is neither murder nor manslaughter unless the death takes place within a year and a day from the blow or other cause. If the deceased died after that time, the law would presume that his death had proceeded from some other cause.⁴ This rule is not adopted in the Code.⁵

1. 'Whoever causes death'.—'Death' means the death of a human being (s. 46). The causing of the death of a child in the mother's womb is not homicide. But it may amount to culpable homicide to cause the death of a living child, if any part of the child has been brought forth, though the child may not have breathed or been completely born.⁶ Under the English law complete emergence of the child from the womb is necessary before it is recognized as a human being. It is immaterial if the person whose death has been caused is not the very person whom the accused intended to kill (see ill. (a) and s. 301). The offence is complete as soon as any person is killed. The Madras High Court has held, though not unanimously, that it is sufficient for the purpose of this section if criminal intention or knowledge on the part of the accused existed with reference to any human being, though the death of the person who actually fell a victim to the accused's act was never compassed by him. All that the section requires is, that there should be an intention to cause death or knowledge that death is likely to be the result, and there is nothing in the section which necessitates that the homicidal intention or knowledge must be with reference to the life of the person whose death is actually caused. Illustration (a) makes it quite clear that the Legislature deliberately employed general and unqualified language in order to cover cases where the person whose death is caused, by the act of the accused, was not the person intended to be killed by him, but some other person. In this case the accused wanted to kill a person on whose life he had effected large insurances, and to secure his object gave him some sweetmeat (halva) in which he had mixed arsenic and mercury in a soluble form, to eat. The man ate a portion of the sweetmeat at the house of the accused's brother-in-law, but not liking its taste, threw away the remainder on the spot. A daughter of the accused's brother-in-law picked up the sweetmeat without the knowledge of the accused, ate a portion of it herself, and gave some to another child who also ate it. The two children who had eaten the poisonous sweetmeat died from the effects of it, but the intended victim survived after considerable suffering. It was held by Benson and Abdur Rahim, JJ., (Sundara Aiyar, J., dissenting) that the accused was guilty of murder. Benson, J., said that "the section does not require that the offender should intend to kill (or know himself to be likely to kill) any particular person. It is enough if he 'causes the death' of any one by doing an act with the intention of 'causing death' to anyone, whether the person intended to be killed or anyone else. This is clear from the first illustration to the section...Nor is it necessary that the death should be caused directly by the action of the offender, without contributory action by the person whose death is caused or by some other person. That contributory action by the person whose death is caused will not necessarily prevent the act of the offender from being culpable homicide, even if the death could not have occurred without such contributory action, is clear from the above illustration, and that contributory action by a third person will not necessarily prevent the act of the offender from being culpable homicide, even if the death could not have occurred without such contributory action, is clear from the second illustration...The language of the section and the illustration seem to me to show that neither the contributory action of Appala Narasimhulu (the accused) in throwing away part of the sweetmeat, nor the contributory action of the girl in picking it up and eating it prevent our holding that it was the accused who caused the girl's death".⁷

2. 'By doing an act'.—None of the endless variety of modes by which human life may be cut short before it becomes in the course of nature extinct, is excluded. Death may be caused by poisoning, starving, striking, drowning, and by a hundred different ways.

By s. 32 words which refer to acts done extend also to illegal omissions and the word 'illegal' is applicable to everything which is an offence, or which is prohibited by law, or which furnishes ground for a civil action (s. 43, supra).

"In order to ascertain what kinds of killing by omission are criminal, it is necessary, in the first place", says Stephen,⁸ "to ascertain the duties which tend to the preservation of life. They are as follows:—A duty in certain cases to provide the necessities of life; a duty to do dangerous acts in a careful manner, and to employ reasonable knowledge, skill, care, and caution therein; a duty to take proper precautions in dealing with dangerous things; and a duty to do any act undertaken to be done, by contract or otherwise, the omission of which would be dangerous to life. Illustrations of these duties are the duty of parents or guardians, and in some cases the duty of masters, to provide food, warmth, clothing, &c., for children; the duty of a surgeon to employ reasonable skill and care in performing an operation; the duty of the driver of a carriage to drive carefully; the duty of a person employed in a mine to keep the doors regulating the ventilation open or shut at proper times. To cause death by the omission of any such duty is homicide, but there is a distinction of a somewhat indefinite kind as to the case in which it is and is not unlawful in the sense of being criminal. In order that homicide by omission may be criminal, the omission must amount to what is sometimes called gross, and sometimes culpable negligence. There must be more, but no one can say how much more, carelessness than is required in order to create a civil liability."

The authors of the Code say: "When acts are made punishable on the ground that those acts produce, or are intended to produce, or are known to be likely to produce, certain evil effects, to what extent ought omissions which produce, which are intended to produce, or which are known to be likely to produce, the same evil effects to be made punishable?"

"Two things we take to be evident; first, that some of these omissions ought to be punished in exactly the same manner in which acts are punished: secondly, that all these omissions ought not to be punished. It will hardly be disputed that a gaoler who voluntarily causes the death of a prisoner by omitting to supply that prisoner with food, or a nurse who voluntarily causes the death of an infant entrusted to her care by omitting to take it out of a tub of water into which it has fallen, ought to be treated as guilty of murder. On the other hand, it will hardly be maintained that a man should be punished as a murderer because he omitted to relieve a beggar, even though there might be the clearest proof that the death of the beggar was the effect of this omission, and that the man who omitted to give the alms knew that the death of the beggar was likely to be the effect of the omission. It will hardly be maintained that a surgeon ought to be treated as a murderer for refusing to go from Calcutta to Meerut to perform an operation, although it should be absolutely certain that this surgeon was the only person in India who could perform it, and that if it were not performed, the person who required it would die. It is difficult to say whether a Penal Code which should put no omissions on the same footing with acts, or a Penal Code which should put all omissions on the same footing with acts, would produce consequences more absurd and revolting. There is no country in which either of these principles is adopted. Indeed, it is hard to conceive how, if either were adopted, society could be held together.

"It is plain, therefore, that a middle course must be taken; but it is not easy to determine what that middle course ought to be. The absurdity of the two extremes is obvious. But there are innumerable intermediate points; and wherever the line of demarcation may be drawn, it will, we fear, include some cases which we might wish to exempt, and will exempt some which we might wish to include..."

"What we propose is this, that where acts are made punishable on the ground that they have caused, or have been intended to cause, or have been known to be likely to cause, a certain evil effect; omissions which have caused, which have been intended to cause, or which have been known to be likely to cause, the same effect shall be punishable in the same manner, provided that such omissions were, on other grounds, illegal. An omission is illegal (see clause 28) if it be an offence, if it be a breach of some direction of law, or if it be such a wrong as would be a good ground for a civil action.

"We cannot defend this rule better than by giving a few illustrations of the way in which it will operate. A omits to give Z food, and by that omission voluntarily causes Z's death. Is this murder? Under our rule it is murder if A was Z's gaoler, directed by the law to furnish Z with food. It is murder if Z was the infant child of A, and had therefore a legal right to sustenance, which right a Civil Court would enforce against A. It is murder if Z was a bedridden invalid, and A nurse hired to feed Z. It is murder if A was detaining Z in unlawful confinement, and had thus contracted (see clause 338) a legal obligation to furnish Z, during the continuance of the confinement, with necessaries. It is not murder if Z is a beggar, who has no other claim on A than that of humanity.

"A omits to tell Z that a river is swollen so high that Z cannot safely attempt to ford it, and by this omission voluntarily causes Z's death. This is murder, if A is a peon stationed by authority to warn travellers from attempting to ford the river. It is murder if A is a guide who had contracted to conduct Z. It is not murder if A is a person on whom Z has no other claim than that of humanity.

"A savage dog fastens on Z. A omits to call off the dog, knowing that if the dog be not called off, it is likely that Z will be killed. Z is killed. This is murder in A, if the dog belonged to A, inasmuch as his omission to take proper order with the dog is illegal (Clause 273). But if A be a mere passer-by, it is not murder."⁹

It will, therefore, appear that if death is caused—

(i) by an illegal omission with the intention that such omission should cause death;

(ii) by an illegal omission with the intention that such omission should cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death;

(iii) by an illegal omission with the knowledge that death is likely to be the result of such omission;

it will be culpable homicide.

See cases under s. 300 relating to neglect to supply medical aid or food.

Death caused by effect of words on imagination or passions.—The authors of the Code say : "The reasonable course, in our opinion, is to consider speaking as an act, and to treat A as guilty of voluntary culpable homicide, if by speaking he has voluntarily caused Z's death, whether his words operated circuitously by inducing Z to swallow poison or directly by throwing Z into convulsions.

"...It would be most difficult to prove to the conviction of any Court that death had really been the effect of excitement produced by words; it would be still more difficult to prove that the person who spoke the words anticipated from them an effect which, except under very peculiar circumstances, and on very peculiar constitutions, no words would produce. Still it seems to us that both these points might be made out by overwhelming evidence; and, supposing them to be so made out, we are unable to perceive any distinction between the case of him who voluntarily causes death in this manner, and the case of him who voluntarily causes death by means of a pistol or a sword. Suppose it to be proved to the entire conviction of a criminal Court that Z, the deceased, was in very critical state of health; that A, the heir to Z's property, had been informed by Z's physicians that Z's recovery absolutely depended on his being kept quiet in mind, and that the smallest mental excitement would endanger his life; that A immediately broke into Z's sick room, and told him a dreadful piece of intelligence, which was a pure invention; that Z went into fits, and died on the spot; that A had afterwards boasted of having cleared the way for himself to a good property by this artifice; these things being fully proved, no Judge could doubt that A had voluntarily caused the death of Z; nor do we perceive any reason for not punishing A in the same manner in which he would have been punished if he had mixed arsenic in Z's medicine."¹⁰

The following illustrations among others stood in the original draft Code¹¹ :—

“(b) A, with the intention or knowledge aforesaid, relates agitating tidings to Z, who is in a critical stage of a dangerous illness; Z dies in consequence. A has committed the offence of voluntary culpable homicide.

“(c) A, with the intention or knowledge aforesaid, gives Z his choice whether Z will kill himself, or suffer lingering torture; Z kills himself in consequence. A has committed the offence of voluntary culpable homicide.”

The Commissioners in their First Report¹² say : “Having maturely considered the matter, we come to the same conclusion with the authors of the Code, that if death is certainly caused by words deliberately used by a person with the intention of causing that result, or with the knowledge that in the condition of the party to whom the words are spoken it is likely that they will make such an impression upon him as to cause his death, and without any such excuse as is admissible under any of the provisions in the chapter of General Exceptions, there is no sufficient reason why that person should be excepted from the penalty of culpable homicide, any more than one who has caused death by the infliction of a bodily injury which he knew to be likely to cause death. Here is the wilful doing of that which is known to be likely to produce evil, manifesting the mens rea essential to criminal responsibility; the evil produced is death; the efficient cause, the words spoken. It is scarcely agreeable to reason, that having traced the effect to its cause, the law should refuse to acknowledge it as an effective cause; or that the Judge should be obliged to say, it is true the effect was produced by the operation of words, but words in law are not an act, therefore the speaker is not criminally responsible.”

English law.—The English law takes no cognizance of homicide unless death results from bodily injury, caused by some act or omission, as distinguished from death occasioned by an influence on the mind, or by any disorder or disease arising from such influence.

“If a man either by working upon the fancy of another or possibly by harsh or unkind usage puts another into such passion of grief or fear, that the party either dies suddenly, or contracts some disease, whereof he dies, though, as the circumstances of the case may be, this may be murder or manslaughter in the sight of God, yet in foro humano it cannot come under the judgment of felony, because no external act of violence was offered, whereof the common law can take notice, and secret things belong to God.”¹³

Death caused without intention whilst doing unlawful act.—If death is caused under circumstances specified in s. 80, the person causing the death will be exonerated under that section. But if it is caused in doing an unlawful act, the question arises whether he should be punished for causing it. The authors of the Code remark : “It will be admitted that when an act is in itself innocent, to punish the person who does it because bad consequences, which no human wisdom could have foreseen, have followed from it would be in the highest degree barbarous and absurd.”¹⁴ But if an offender while committing a crime causes death which he did not intend to cause, or knew himself likely to cause, he should be punished for the accident. “To punish as a murderer every man who, while committing a heinous offence, causes death by pure misadventure, is a course which evidently adds nothing to the security of human life. No man can so conduct himself as to make it absolutely certain that he shall not be so unfortunate as to cause the death of a fellow creature. The utmost that he can do is to abstain from everything which is at all likely to cause death. No fear of punishment can make him do more than this; and, therefore, to punish a man who has done this can add nothing to the security of human life. The only good effect which such punishment can produce will be to deter people from committing any of those offences which turn into murders what are in themselves mere accidents. It is in fact an addition to the punishment of those offences, and it is an addition made in the very worst way. For example, hundreds of persons in some great cities are in the habit of picking pockets. They know that they are guilty of a great offence. . . . Unhappily one of these hundreds attempts to take the purse of a gentleman who has a loaded pistol in his pocket. The thief touches the trigger, the pistol goes off, the gentleman is shot dead. To treat the case of this pickpocket differently from that of the numerous pickpockets who steal under exactly the same circumstances, with exactly the same intentions, with no less risk of causing death, with no greater care to avoid causing death; to send them to the house of correction as thieves, and him to the gallows as a murderer, appears to us an unreasonable course . . .

"We trust . . . that we have judged correctly in proposing that when a person engaged in the commission of an offence causes death by pure accident, he shall suffer only the punishment of his offence, without any addition on account of such accidental death."¹⁵ See ill. (c) to this section which is contrary to English law. The Court of Criminal Appeal in England has held that if the proximate cause of an act leading to death is terror caused by another, the latter may be guilty of manslaughter, though he used no violence.¹⁶ If two people are fighting in anger and one of them falls over and is killed, it is a case of manslaughter against the other.¹⁷ If a person were standing at the edge of a cliff and another were to hold up his fist before him in a fighting manner, so that he fell over and was killed, it would be a case of manslaughter against that other.¹⁸ Causing death through flight or retreat from a reasonable apprehension of serious violence is at least manslaughter.¹⁹

English law.—If a person whilst committing an unlawful act accidentally kills another he would be liable for manslaughter or murder according as his act was felony or misdemeanour.²⁰ But in subsequent cases this principle has been considerably modified.²¹

3. 'With the intention of causing death.'—By 'intention' is meant the expectation of the consequence in question. "It was an universal principle, that when a man is charged with doing an act, of which the probable consequence may be highly injurious, the intention is an inference of law resulting from the doing the act."²² Intention does not imply or assume the existence of some previous design or forethought. It means an actual intention, the existing intention of the moment, and is proved by, or inferred from, the acts of the accused and the circumstances of the case.²³ Thus the deliberate use by a sane man of deadly weapons, the deliberate discharge of loaded fire-arms, leads at once to the inference that his intention was to cause death. No proof of intention beyond that which such an act of itself supplies is requisite.

The presumption of law is that a man intends the natural and inevitable consequences of his own acts. It is, therefore, not necessary to take into consideration the accused's state of mind, at the time of committing the act in question, for the purpose of determining whether he intended to cause death, or not.²⁴ In a Calcutta case, Mukerji, J., has observed that it is not always quite easy to apply the rule of English criminal law that a man must be presumed to intend the natural or probable consequences of his act to the Indian criminal law in view of the distinction that the Penal Code makes between intention and knowledge. On the question of knowledge much depends on the intellectual capacity of the actor.²⁵

The existence of intention is not to be inferred unless death follows as a natural and probable consequence from the act. Where, for instance, death is caused by a push or blow, which would not cause the death of a healthy person, because the person whose death is caused suffered from a disease, it would not be fair to infer intention or even knowledge. The consequence here is far from being the natural and probable consequence of the act done, and it must be supposed that the offender never contemplated the result. Some extrinsic evidence should be adduced and called for to show the real intent or knowledge in such a case, e.g., that the offender was aware of the disease and the blow was given on the diseased part. Thus where the death is caused by an extraordinary intervening circumstance, no presumption of intention or knowledge can be said to arise. The intention or knowledge must be proved as a matter of fact. There must be a specific finding of the intention to cause death.¹

No constructive, but an actual, intention to cause death is required.²

The 'intention' or 'knowledge' with which an act which caused death was committed is not constructive or a presumption of law, but a matter of fact to be judged of in each case, and proof of collateral facts to explain the motives and designs of the accused is admissible.³

Where death is caused by an act which is criminal in itself irrespective of its consequences, the degree of guilt of the offender depends on the intention or knowledge with which he did the act, and the sections under which he may be convicted are 302, 304, 325, 323 and 352 with variations on account of the weapon or means used, the provocation, and so forth.⁴

In order to possess and to form an intention there must be a capacity for reason. And when by some extraneous force the capacity for reason has been ousted, the capacity to form an intention must have been unseated too. But knowledge stands upon a different footing. Some degree of knowledge must be attributed to every sane person. Obviously the degree of knowledge which any particular person can be assumed to possess must vary. For instance, the same degree of knowledge cannot be attributed to an uneducated as to an educated person. But to some extent knowledge must be attributed to every one who is sane.⁵

4. 'With the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.'—The connection between the 'act' and the death caused thereby must be direct and distinct; and though not immediate it must not be too remote. If the nature of the connection between the act and the death is in itself obscure, or if it is obscured by the action of concurrent causes, or if the connection is broken by the intervention of the subsequent causes, or if the interval of time between the death and the act is too long, the above condition is not fulfilled.

"It is indispensable that the death should be clearly connected with the act of violence, 'not merely by a chain of causes and effects, but by such direct influence as is calculated to produce the effect without the intervention of any considerable change of circumstances.'"⁶

The authors of the Code observe: "We long considered whether it would be advisable to except from this definition any description of acts or illegal omissions, on the ground that such acts or illegal omissions do not ordinarily cause death, or that they cause death very remotely . . .

"There is undoubtedly a great difference between acts which cause death immediately, and acts which cause death remotely; between acts which are almost certain to cause death, and acts which cause death only under very extraordinary circumstances. But that difference, we conceive, is a matter to be considered by the tribunals when estimating the effect of the evidence in a particular case, not by the legislature in framing the general law. It will require strong evidence to prove that an act of a kind which very seldom causes death, or an act which has caused death very remotely, has actually caused death in a particular case. It will require still stronger evidence to prove that such an act was contemplated by the person who did it as likely to cause death; but if it be proved by satisfactory evidence that death has been so caused, and has been caused voluntarily, we see no reason for exempting the person who caused it from the punishment of voluntary culpable homicide."⁷

"To justify a conviction of culpable homicide of any sort against an offender who has committed an intentional act causing bodily injury to another and which act was intended for some particular individual, there must at least be a finding that the offender intended by his act to cause bodily injury likely to cause death."⁸

'Intention of causing death' and 'intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death'.—The difference between these two expressions is a difference of degrees in criminality. The latter is a degree lower in the scale of criminality than the former. But as, in both cases, the object is the same, the law does not make any distinction in punishment.⁹

Cases.—Where the accused stuffed a cloth into the deceased's mouth in order to silence him, not with any idea of killing him, it could only be presumed that the accused knew they were likely in so doing to cause his death, and so were guilty of offences under ss. 304 and 395 and not under ss. 302 and 396.¹⁰ Where the accused gave blows on the head of the deceased with sticks and they intended or knew themselves to be likely to smash their victim's skull, it was held that they must be taken to have known that they were likely to cause the death of the victim, and were, therefore, guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹¹ Where death was caused by beating a number of blows with a lathi but the injuries inflicted upon the deceased were all simple except one which fractured a finger bone and death was due to shock, it was held that the assailants did not intend to cause death or bodily injury as was sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death, but they must be presumed to have known that they were likely to cause death and that they were, therefore, guilty of an offence under the second part of this section.¹² The Madras High Court has on similar facts held that the act amounted to murder.¹³

Where the accused gave a blow to the deceased with the wooden handle of a hoe measuring three feet and ten inches and weighing eighty-two tolas, and it appeared that the accused gave only one blow on the spur of the moment on the thinner part of the head, it was held that the weapon could not be said to be a formidable one and that as the intention to kill could not be presumed, the offence was culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁴

5. 'With the knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death.'—Knowledge is a strong word and imports a certainty and not merely a probability.¹⁵ The knowledge referred to in this section and s. 300 is the personal knowledge of the person who does the act.¹⁶ If a man intentionally commits an offence, and consequences beyond his immediate purpose result, it is for the Court to determine how far he can be held to have the knowledge that he was likely by such act to cause the actual result. If such knowledge can be imputed, the result is not to be attributed to mere rashness; if it cannot be imputed, still the wilful offence does not take the character of rashness because its consequences have been unfortunate. Acts, probably or possibly, involving danger to others, but which in themselves are not offences, may be offences under s. 336, 337, 338 or 304A, if done without due care to guard against the dangerous consequences. Acts which are offences in themselves must be judged with regard to the knowledge, or means of knowledge, of the offender and placed in their appropriate place in the class of offences of the same character.¹⁷

In judging of knowledge had by the accused, we must consider the circumstances; the blow that to one person, or under ordinary circumstances, may not, in the ordinary course of nature, be likely to cause death, may yet be imminently dangerous to another, or under special circumstances. Where the accused kicked his wife, eight or nine years of age, on the back with his bare foot, from which kick she fell down and died immediately, it was held that he was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The Court said: "To kick a girl of tender age with such force as to produce rupture of the abdomen in a healthy subject, appears to us to be an act of such character that no reasonable man could be ignorant of the likelihood of its causing death."¹⁸ Where three persons attacked a fourth with lathis, the blows being directed at the head of that fourth, it was held that they must be fixed with the knowledge that they were likely to cause death.¹⁹ Any person who joins a body of men who are going to use lathi to attack others must know that it is likely that death may be caused and consequently if death is caused they are all liable and are guilty of offences of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.²⁰ Presumably everybody knows that the abdomen is a most delicate and vulnerable part of the human body, and if a man with that knowledge kicks the abdomen with such violence as to cause fracture of two ribs and rupture of the spleen which was normal, he should be presumed to have done so with the knowledge that by so kicking he was likely to cause death.²¹

Gross negligence may amount to knowledge.—If a person without exercising due care and caution does any act under a sudden impulse he will be presumed to have knowledge of the consequences arising from his act. Where the accused struck at with a club and killed a man, being at the time under the bona fide belief that the object at which he struck was not a human being but something supernatural, but, through terror, having taken no steps to satisfy himself that it was not a human being, he was held to have committed the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.²²

'Intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death': 'Knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death'.—The practical difference between these two phrases is expressed in the punishment provided in s. 304. But the phrase 'with the knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death' includes all cases of rash acts by which death is caused, for rashness imports a knowledge of the likely result of an act which the actor does in spite of the risk.

If a man causes death by doing an act merely with the knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death, the act comes within this section, and not within s. 300.²³

Cases.—Knowledge of probable consequence of act.—Beating.—Where the accused assaulted a thief so severely that one hundred and forty-one marks of separate blows were found on his body and several of his ribs were broken and he died;²⁴ where the husband and the father of a woman, who had been enticed away, lay in wait for the offender and beat him with sticks on the back and chest and he died from the effect of the blows;²⁵ where the accused beat a person with his hands and feet in a most merciless manner and caused his death;¹ where a man was beaten to such an extent that one of his thighs was a mass of bruises, both his legs were fractured below the knee and various other minor injuries were inflicted on the legs and on the trunk;² where a man killed his wife by a single blow,³ or a single forcible kick on her side;⁴ and where a mother took a heavy piece of wood and struck on the head of her daughter, about whom there was a gossip in the village, and the daughter died,⁵ it was held that they had committed culpable homicide not amounting to murder and that their offence fell under the latter part of s. 304.

Where the accused broke into a dwelling-house at night and, in order to evade arrest, struck wildly with a dangerous weapon, regardless of the effect of his blows, and by so doing actually caused the death of a person, he was held guilty of culpable homicide, notwithstanding that he never intended or knew himself to be likely to cause the death of such person.⁶ R struck G three blows with a lathi. One blow fractured the bones of the left forearm, another fractured a bone in the right hand, while the third fractured both bones of the left leg. In the case of the third injury gangrene supervened and G died in consequence. It was held that R was guilty of either culpable homicide not amounting to murder under s. 304 or causing grievous hurt.⁷ Where the accused inflicted four wounds none of which was on vital parts of the body, and the deceased died owing to septic poisoning in respect of two of them, two and a half months after the occurrence, and was sentenced to death under s. 302, it was held that the accused's intent was not to inflict bodily injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, but to cause bodily injury which was likely to cause death, the degree of probability as to death ensuing not being so high as to justify a finding of murder, and the conviction was altered to one under the first part of s. 304 and the sentence reduced to ten years' rigorous imprisonment.⁸ Where two girls were struggling for the possession of a handful of gram and the elder girl aged fifteen gave a blow with a thin stick to the younger girl aged eight whereupon the uncle of the latter came running to the place and gave a blow with a lathi (club) on the head of the elder girl and after the girl had fallen gave two more blows on her thigh, and the blow on the head caused fracture of the skull and the girl died, it was held that the accused was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁹ Where the assault was committed by an impulsive young man as a result of sudden excitement, and though he gave two blows to his victim, neither of the blows was aimed at a vital part of the body, and it appeared that it could not have been present to the mind of the accused that a stab on the frontal prominence of the hip would penetrate the abdominal cavity, it was held that the accused had no intention to cause death or such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, that at the most he could be burdened with knowledge that his act was likely to cause death and that he was guilty under the latter part of s. 304.¹⁰

It holds that the words in this section "or with the knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death" must be interpreted in the light of s. 300 and similarly are inapplicable to a case where specific bodily injury is intentionally caused to a particular person.

Exorcising evil spirit.—Where the accused, in exorcising the spirits of a girl, whom they believed to be possessed, subjected her to a beating which resulted in her death, it was held that they were guilty of culpable homicide.¹¹ Although the intention of the persons who inflict beating in such circumstances is not to cause death but to exorcise the spirit they must be taken to have known that they are likely to cause death.¹² But where the injuries caused under like circumstances were not severe, the accused was acquitted.¹³ Where a man deliberately murdered his wife under the belief that she was haunted by evil spirits and that if he killed her the evil spirits would leave her, he was held guilty of murder.¹⁴ Where the accused murdered the deceased knowing full well the nature of his act, but under the belief that by so doing he was helping in the recovery of his wife and children, whose illness he attributed to the deceased, whom he believed to be a witch, it was held that the accused was guilty of murder.¹⁵ Where the accused possessed by a superstitious belief made an offering of his child to a crocodile in a certain tank, with a pure heart, believing that the crocodile, though it would doubtless take the child away, would return it unharmed and the child would thereafter lead a charmed life and attain to a good old age, it was held that, as the accused had no intention of causing death to the child, he was guilty of an offence punishable under the last clause of s. 304, as what he did, he did with knowledge that his act would result in the death of the child.¹⁶ The accused whose right hand was atrophied, deformed and weak, and unfit to handle a knife with it, in the superstitious belief that the deceased, an old lady of about sixty years, was a 'witch' who had been 'shadowing' a child of the family of the accused and was the cause of the illness, knocked her down, and throwing the whole weight of his body on her plunged a knife with his left hand (which was quite normal) in the temple of the deceased with deadly effect. It was held that the accused was guilty of murder. The fact that he plunged the knife in such a vital part of the deceased as the temple indicated that he could have had no other intention than to cause death.¹⁷

died from the injury, the persons concerned in the fact were held guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁸

Any person, whether licensed or unlicensed, who deals with the life or health of another person is bound to use competent skill and sufficient attention; if the patient dies for want of either, the person is guilty of manslaughter.¹⁹

Causing a person to be bitten by snake.—A snake-charmer exhibited in public a venomous snake, whose fangs he knew had not been extracted, and to show his own skill and dexterity, but without any intention to cause harm to anyone, placed the snake on the head of one of the spectators. The spectator in trying to push off the snake was bitten, and died in consequence. It was held that the snake-charmer was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.²⁰ The accused who professed by tattooing to render persons immune from the effect of snake-bite, caused a poisonous snake to bite the deceased whom he had tattooed but who died. It was held that the burden of proving that the accused was justified in believing and did believe that he could give immunity lay on the accused and that as he failed to discharge the burden, he was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.²¹

Squeezing of testicles.—Where a woman, by gripping and squeezing the testicles of her husband, reduced them to a pulpy condition, thereby causing an injury which resulted in death due to the shock so inflicted on the nervous system, it was held that she was guilty of culpable homicide.²² Here the violence of the attack on the husband's delicate parts was sufficient to justify an inference that the wife had knowledge of the likely effect of her attack. But where death was caused not by the squeezing of the testicles but owing to the unsound bodily condition of the deceased and the medical evidence showed that the injury inflicted upon the deceased would not in normal conditions have endangered his life, it was held that the accused was guilty of hurt only.²³

Strangulation.—The deceased was grazing his sheep. The accused came along with a dog. The deceased hit the dog with a stick for having molested his sheep, whereupon the accused seized hold of him in a sudden temper, took the turban of the deceased from his head and strangled him to death. There had been no enmity between the two and it was a sudden and unpremeditated attack. It was held that the accused was guilty of culpable homicide and not murder, inasmuch as the injury which the accused intended to inflict was not sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, but the act of the accused was done with the knowledge that he was likely to cause death.²⁴

Injury causing death.—Where the deceased had beaten the accused with a shoe and being overpowered by others, the accused lost self-control and picked up a sort of wooden substance which was lying nearby and introduced it into the rectum of the deceased who died in consequence, it was held that the offence was one under s. 304, part II, and one not under s. 325.²⁵

English cases.—Where a person in loco parentis inflicted corporal punishment on a child, and compelled it to work for an unreasonable number of hours, and beyond its strength, and the child died, the death being from consumption, he was held guilty of manslaughter.¹ A schoolmaster, on the second day after a boy's return to school, wrote to the parent saying the boy was extremely obstinate, and ought to be severely and frequently beaten. The father replied, "I do not wish to interfere with your plan". Accordingly the schoolmaster beat the boy for two hours and a half secretly in the night with a thick stick until he died. It was held that, such punishment being excessive and unreasonable, the schoolmaster was guilty of manslaughter.² Where a father who, for some childish fault, gave an infant of two years and a half about a dozen strokes with a strap an inch wide and eighteen inches long, from the effects of which the child died, it was held that he was guilty of manslaughter.³

Death caused without intention or knowledge is not culpable homicide.—The offence of culpable homicide supposes an intention, or knowledge of likelihood, of causing death. The intention must be directed either deliberately to putting an end to human life or to some act which to the knowledge of the accused is likely to eventuate in the putting an end to human life. The knowledge must have reference to the particular circumstances in which the accused is placed and the intention demanded by the section must stand in some relation to a person who either is alive or who is believed by the accused to be alive.⁴ In the absence of such intention or knowledge, the offence committed may be the offence of causing grievous hurt,⁵ or simple hurt.⁶ When injuries have been followed by death and the question is what offence has been committed, it is not concluded by any backward reasoning as to presumable intention from the mere fact that injuries caused did not in fact result in death. What has to be seen is what degree of injury the accused actually intended and what he knew as to the consequences of such injury.⁷

The rule that where a single blow is inflicted and it is not shown that it was the intention of the accused to cause death, the offence committed by him, if his blow results in the death of his victim, would be culpable homicide not amounting to murder or grievous hurt, applies only to cases where the assault is committed on a sudden quarrel and without premeditation and not to cases where the assault is premeditated.⁸ The following observations are pertinent:—"It appears that there is a growing tendency among Sessions Judges to convict of the offence of grievous hurt in cases of offences against the person which have resulted fatally. The description of grievous hurt contemplated is practically never stated. In the great majority of cases, it could only be that mentioned in the 8th clause of s. 320, viz., 'any hurt which endangers life'. . . A person who voluntarily inflicts injury such as to endanger life must always, except in the most extraordinary and exceptional circumstances, be taken to know that he is likely to cause death. If the victim is actually killed, the conviction in such cases ought ordinarily to be of the offence of culpable homicide."⁹

Even in the case of gross negligence a man is liable for the natural consequence of his act. But where death results not as a direct consequence of the act of the accused, but from some other cause of which he was unaware, then the accused cannot be charged with culpable homicide. Where death is caused owing to the rupture of a diseased spleen and not violence, it is on this principle that the accused is convicted of hurt or grievous hurt.

Cases.—Where the accused by a single blow with a deadly weapon killed another who was entering at dead of night into a dark room, where the accused and his wife were sleeping, for the purpose of having criminal intercourse with her, it was held that he was guilty of causing grievous hurt only.¹⁰ Where, in the course of a trivial dispute, the accused gave the deceased a severe push on the back which caused him to fall on the road below to a distance of two cubits and a half, and in falling the deceased sustained an injury from which tetanus resulted which caused his death on the fifth day after, it was held that this was simply a case of using criminal force.¹¹ According to the English law this would have been treated as manslaughter.

B, was coming to help B, L entered into his house and came out with a chopper and attacked B inflicting more than one injury. L allowed himself to be disarmed by G who got some slight injuries. B was sent to the hospital from which he went away twice of his own accord. After his return the second time he died of septic pneumonia. It was held that as it might fairly be inferred that there was no intention of causing death, or even of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, L could only be convicted of having caused grievous hurt.¹³ Where the deceased and his son made an attack on the accused who attacked the deceased though his life was not in danger and it appeared that the accused had no knowledge that the wounds he inflicted were likely to cause death, it was held that although he was not justified in attacking the deceased and his son with such ferocity as he did, the accused was guilty of grievous hurt.¹³

A youth of about eighteen had, without any ancillary violence, sexual intercourse with a well-developed girl probably under twelve years of age; the girl did not consent; her vagina was ruptured and, as a result, she died of shock. It was held that, as death was not the natural consequence to be expected from a simple sexual offence, the accused was not guilty of culpable homicide.¹⁴ Where an old man as a result of being knocked over had some of his ribs broken and died, it was held that the act of knocking over though it resulted in his death was one that the accused could not reasonably have known to be likely to cause death and he was guilty of causing hurt with a lethal weapon under s. 325.¹⁵

Death due to diseased spleen or heart.—(1) Grievous hurt.—Where the accused gave a blow with a light bamboo stick, not more than an inch in diameter, to the deceased, who was suffering from a diseased spleen, on the region of that organ, he was held guilty of causing grievous hurt.¹⁶ The accused went to a place where a cart was standing, and presuming that it belonged to a man who was sleeping on a cot close by, roused him and told him to let him have the cart. The man explained that the cart did not belong to him and remarked at the same time that he was ill. The accused, thereupon, got irritated and pulled the cot about, causing the man to fall out of it, kicked him and struck him on the side or on the ribs with a stick. Owing to the injuries he had received, the man died very soon after. It was held that as the deceased was suffering from a diseased spleen the accused was guilty of causing grievous hurt.¹⁷ The accused, while engaged in a verbal wrangle with his wife, struck her a blow on the left side with great force, the result of which was that she vomited and bled from the nose, and within little more than an hour died. The death was caused by the rupture of the spleen. It was held that he was guilty of grievous hurt only.¹⁸ Where the main object of the accused was to rescue the cattle which the deceased had impounded and to give him a beating for refusal to surrender them, and no injury was inflicted on any vital part of the accused's body, and there was no evidence to show that the accused had any knowledge that the deceased had a badly enlarged heart on account of which he died, it was held that under the circumstances the accused could not be presumed to have had an intention to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, and was guilty of an offence under s. 325 and not under s. 304.¹⁹ The accused sat on the chest of the deceased and began to strangle him and would not desist despite entreaties of relations. Suddenly the deceased died. According to medical evidence, death was caused by shock and internal bleeding due to rupture of the spleen, which was considerably enlarged, and not to strangulation. The other injuries were not sufficient to cause death if the spleen had not been ruptured. The fact of the spleen being enlarged was not known to the accused or the relations. It was held that the accused was guilty of culpable homicide under s. 304, second part, and that when death had occurred it was obviously unsatisfactory to find a man guilty of grievous hurt and the Legislature had taken into consideration that the intention to cause grievous hurt might be a more serious moral offence than the knowledge that death was likely to occur, by making imprisonment obligatory under s. 325 and not under s. 304, second part.²⁰

(2) Hurt.—Where the accused, having received great provocation from his wife, pushed her with both arms so as to throw her with violence to the ground, and after she was down slapped her with his open hand, and the woman died on account of rupture of her spleen which was diseased, it was held that the accused was guilty of causing hurt.²¹ Similarly, where a wife died from a chance kick in the spleen inflicted by her husband on provocation given by her, the husband not knowing that the spleen was diseased, he was held guilty of causing hurt.²² The accused, dissatisfied and irritated by the lazy and inefficient manner in which a punkha cooly was managing a punkha, went up to him and struck him one or more blows. The cooly was suffering from a diseased spleen and died from the injuries he had received. It was held that the accused was guilty of causing hurt.²³ Where the accused threw a piece of a brick at the deceased which struck him in the region of the spleen and ruptured it, the spleen being diseased, it was held that he was guilty of causing hurt.²⁴ The accused was charged with having caused the death of one N by kicking him over the region of the spleen, being enraged at the latter having allowed his goats to stray into his fields. The medical evidence showed that the spleen of the deceased was enormously large, and slight injuries over the region of the spleen would be sufficient to cause its rupture which generally ended fatally. It was held that in the absence of satisfactory evidence to prove knowledge of the state of health of the deceased on the part of the accused, the conviction should be for hurt only.²⁵

6. Explanation 1.—A person causing bodily injury to another who is labouring under a disorder, disease, or bodily infirmity, and thereby accelerating the death of that other, is deemed to have ‘caused his death’. But one of the elements of the offence of culpable homicide must be present.¹ The Explanation assumes that the bodily injury was inflicted with the intention of causing death, or the knowledge that it would be likely to cause death. Where there is no such intention or knowledge the offence is not culpable homicide under the first two parts of this section.²

“An offence affecting the life of a person who must soon die either from a mortal disease or in course of nature from old age and decay, is not a less offence than one which affects the life of a person in strong health. The offender causes death in the one case by accelerating that event by a few months, or days, or hours; in the other case, possibly, he hastens the event by many years. The real difference between the two cases is not in point of law, but in respect of the degree of proof, requisite to show the cause of death. For where the death of a person who receives some bodily injury while labouring under a disease is the subject of enquiry, the Court in estimating the evidence must consider whether it is sufficiently proved which of the two causes, the disease or the bodily injury to the deceased person, is the cause of his dying on the day when his death occurs. It is not necessary (if it were possible) that the evidence should enable the Court to apportion the two causes and the degree in which each of them contributes to the result. But the Court must be satisfied (1) that the death at the time when it occurs is not caused solely by the disease; and (2) that it is caused by the bodily injury to this extent, that it is accelerated by such injury. Suppose A is ill of small-pox, and Z gives him pills in such doses that the disease is aggravated and death is accelerated; Z has caused death, notwithstanding that it may be proved that A must have eventually died of the small-pox.”³

The English law is to the same effect.⁴ The accused one night came home before his wife, and he was in a condition of violent excitement, and was overheard to express a determination of “giving his wife something” when she came in. When the woman did come home there were at once sounds of an altercation, and shortly afterwards the woman was seen by several witnesses to rush from the house into the road closely pursued by the accused, who was at the same time using violent threats towards her. She was then seen to fall into the roadway, and lying there she was kicked on the left forearm by the accused. When picked up she was found to be dead. The post mortem examination showed that the deceased was suffering from a persistent thymus gland, and the medical evidence was to the effect that any combination of physical exertion and fright or strong emotion might occasion the death of the person having such gland. It was held that the evidence that the death of the deceased was due to combination of physical exertion and fright, or strong emotion caused by an illegal act of the accused, was sufficient to support a conviction for manslaughter without proof of actual violence on his part occasioning the death.⁵

The Calcutta High Court has held that if a person was suffering from an injury which would render injuries (which would not have a fatal effect to an ordinary man) fatal to that person, it does not necessarily follow, as it would in the case of a healthy man, that the person inflicting those injuries knew it to be likely that death would be caused thereby.⁶

Where a number of persons armed with lathis make a concerted attack upon another man and practically kill him on the spot inflicting severe injuries on the head, it must be supposed that they had the intention, if not to kill him, at any rate, to cause such hurt as they must have known to be imminently dangerous and likely to cause his death and each of the party contributing to the result must be found guilty of murder. Where the attack was of such a reckless character and the injuries of such a nature that the assailants must have known that they were likely to endanger that man's life the fact that the deceased suffered from some abnormality, such as a fatty heart, cannot affect the intention and knowledge of the accused. Even if the existence of the fatty heart contributed to the death Explanation 1 to this section makes the offence murder.⁷

7. Explanation 2.—‘By resorting to proper remedies death... might have been prevented’.—The Explanation reproduces the English law. The authors of the Code say: “We see no reason for excepting such cases [the cases of persons who die of a slight wound, which, from neglect or from the application of improper remedies, has proved mortal] from the simple general rule which we propose. It will, indeed, be in general more difficult to prove that death has been caused by a scratch than by a stab which has reached the heart; and it will, in a still greater degree, be more difficult to prove that a scratch was intended to cause death than that a stab was intended to cause death; yet both these points might be fully established. Suppose such a case as the following:—It is proved that A inflicted a slight wound on Z, a child who stood between him and a large property; it is proved that the ignorant and superstitious servants about Z applied the most absurd remedies to the wound; it is proved that under their treatment the wound mortified, and the child died. Letters from A to a confidant are produced; in those letters, A congratulates himself on his skill, remarks that he could not have inflicted a more severe wound without exposing himself to be punished as a murderer, relates, with exultation, the mode of treatment followed by the people who have charge of Z, and boasts that he always foresaw that they would turn the slightest incision into a mortal wound. It appears to us, that if such evidence were produced, A ought to be punished as a murderer.

“Again, suppose that A makes a deliberate attempt to commit assassination; in the presence of numbers he aims a knife at the heart of Z, but the knife glances aside, and inflicts only a slight wound... In such cases there is no doubt whatever as to the intention. Suppose that the person who received the wound is under the necessity of exposing himself to a moist atmosphere immediately afterwards, and that, in consequence, he is attacked with tetanus and dies. Here again, however slight the wound may have been, we are unable to perceive any good reason for not punishing A as a murderer.”⁸

“Although proof be given that the wound or other bodily injury if skilfully treated might not have resulted in death, yet if in fact death is the result, the wound ‘causes’ death. And it does not avail the offender to prove that the first might have been removed or rendered inoperative by the application of proper remedies and that death might thus have been prevented. ‘Proper remedies and skilful treatment’ may not be within the reach of the wounded man; or, if they are at hand, he may be unable or unwilling to resort to them. But this is immaterial so far as relates to the due interpretation of the words 'cause of death'. The primary cause which sets in motion some other cause,—as the severe wound which induces gangrene or fever,—and the ultimate effect, death, are sufficiently connected as cause and effect, notwithstanding that the supervening sickness or disease might have been cured by medical skill. All that it is essential to establish is, that the death has been caused by the bodily injury, and, if there be any intervening cause, that it is connected with a sufficient degree of probability with the primary one.

"Cases not reached by either of the above Explanations may occur, in which there will be some perplexity in determining the cause of death. Suppose a person who has received some slight wound or hurt resorts not to 'proper remedies and skilful treatment,' but to some ignorant and unskilled adviser; and that, in consequence, the bodily injury is aggravated by the application of unwholesome salves and death ensues—or suppose he drinks spirit immoderately in a hot climate or suppose he is carried to a hospital where erysipelas happens at the time to be prevalent, and catches the disorder and dies of it—or again suppose the bodily injury renders the amputation of a limb necessary, and that the patient is soon afterwards attacked by some complaint innocuous to a person in sound health, but which proves fatal to him in his weakly condition. In all these cases, if no bodily injury had been received, the man would not have died; and it may therefore be said that the injury is in some sense the cause of death. But it seems indispensable that the death should be connected with the act of violence or other primary cause not merely by a chain of causes and effects, but by such direct influence as is calculated to produce the effect without the intervention of any considerable change of circumstances.

"In each of the instances we have last supposed, the bodily injury caused death under extraordinary circumstances. Its direct influence in producing that result was small, and the intervening circumstances which more immediately caused death could scarcely have been foreseen. Nevertheless the use of the words 'to cause death' without qualification or exception, brings such cases within this term of the definition of the offence of culpable homicide. The difference between these cases and others of less complexity is a matter to be considered by the Court in estimating the effect of the evidence. But it is difficult to conceive any evidence sufficient to establish an intention to cause death on the part of a person who inflicts a bodily injury which ends so unexpectedly in death".⁹

Where an injury is intentionally inflicted the defence that no proper medical treatment was forthcoming does not exonerate the person who caused the injury from guilt of murder if he intended that the injury should be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, or knew that it was likely to cause death to that person. It does not exonerate him from guilt of culpable homicide if death ensues as a natural or likely consequence. Such a person is deemed to have caused the death and his degree of criminal responsibility must depend on the knowledge or intention to be gathered from the proved facts.¹⁰

If death results from an injury voluntarily caused, the person who causes that injury is deemed to have caused death, although the life of the victim might have been saved if proper medical attention had been given, and even if medical treatment was given but was not the proper treatment, provided that it was administered in good faith by a competent physician or surgeon.¹¹

When the disease which actually causes death is meningitis, peritonitis, tetanus, pneumonia, etc., and it is the natural and probable result of the injury which the person inflicting the injury has caused, the person who inflicts the injury must be held responsible for the disease arising from the injury.¹²

In order that a person should be guilty of culpable homicide, the injury inflicted must be a proximate cause of death, and not a remote cause connected with the death by a chain of intervening events. The death of a person must be at least a likely consequence of the injury received.¹³

Cases.—Where a wound is inflicted under circumstances that immediate death would make the person inflicting it guilty of murder, he will be liable for murder even if the death ensues from an operation thought necessary and performed by competent medical advisers, who considered that the wound was dangerous;¹⁴ nor will the liability be less even though life may have been preserved but for the refusal of the deceased to submit to a surgical operation.¹⁵ Where the accused was indicted for the murder of his wife by kicking her, and a surgeon administered brandy to her as a restorative, some of which went the wrong way, and entered her lungs, and might have caused death, it was held that he was guilty of manslaughter.¹⁶ Where a person inflicted grievous injuries on another, and as a result of these injuries pneumonia supervened and the latter died, it was held that the offence committed was that of murder.¹⁷ Similarly, where an injury was inflicted on a person by a blow which in the judgment of competent medical men rendered an operation advisable, and, as a preliminary to the operation, chloroform was administered to the patient, who died during its administration, and it was agreed that the patient would not have died but for its administration, it was held that the person causing the injury was liable to be indicted for manslaughter.¹⁸ But where a person causes simple injury to another and the latter dies of septic meningitis owing to neglect of treatment and application of wrong remedies, the person causing the injury is not guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁹ If the wound or hurt be not mortal, and it shall be made clearly and certainly to appear that the death of the party was caused by ill-applications by himself or those about him, of unwholesome salves or medicines, and not by the wound or hurt, it seems that this is no species of homicide. But when a wound not in itself mortal, for want of proper applications, or from neglect, turns to a gangrene or a fever, and that gangrene or fever is the immediate cause of the death of the party wounded, the party by whom the wound is given is guilty of murder or manslaughter according to circumstances. For though the fever or gangrene, and not the wound, be the immediate cause of the death, yet the wound being the cause of gangrene or fever, is the immediate cause of the death, causa causati. Thus, it was resolved, that if one gives wounds to another who neglects the cure of them or is disorderly, and does not keep that rule which a person wounded should do, yet if he die it is murder or manslaughter according to the circumstances; because if the wounds had not been, the man had not died; and, therefore, neglect or disorder in the person who receives the wounds shall not excuse the person who gave them.²⁰ But where a person is seriously injured by the accused, and as a result of the injuries a gangrene sets in and becomes the immediate cause of death of the victim, the accused is guilty of murder.²¹

8. Explanation 3.—This Explanation gets over the difficulty of proving the 'birth' of a child as required by English law. Under the English law the child should have completely emerged to constitute it a human being.

The causing of the death of a child in the mother's womb is not homicide; such an offence is punishable under s. 315. "The life of a child, while it remains wholly within womb, is a part of the mother's life, and not a separate and distinct existence. But as soon as any part of the child has been brought forth from the womb, the child is accounted a living human being, to cause whose death may be culpable homicide. It is further explained that this may be so though the child may not have breathed. The mere fact of having breathed is a very uncertain indication of life in such cases, for it is well known that many children are wholly brought forth and eventually live, and yet do not breathe for some time after their birth.

"It may be said that a child is not completely born until after the umbilical cord has been severed, notwithstanding that the mother has been completely delivered, and that the child is in existence. But it is obvious that to cause the death of such a child ought to be deemed an offence of the same nature, as the causing of the death of a child one month, one year, or ten years old. The Explanation expressly states that complete birth is not requisite. Instead of an uncertain period which it would be difficult to define satisfactorily and which would, in many cases of infanticide, greatly add to the difficulty to prove a definite and readily ascertained point of time (that is, the time when any part of the child is brought forth) is fixed, to denote when the child may become a subject of culpable homicide."²² Under this Explanation it must be proved not only that the child breathed and was therefore a living child (for that might have been done while it was still entirely in the womb), but that it breathed after it had wholly or partially emerged from its mother's womb.²³

The use of the word 'child' seems to assume that the foetus must have assumed the human shape.

300. Except in the cases hereinafter excepted, culpable homicide is murder, if the act by which the death is caused is done with the intention of causing death,¹ or—

*2ndly*².—If it is done with the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused, or—

*3rdly*³.—If it is done with the intention of causing bodily injury to any person and the bodily injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, or—

*4thly*⁴.—If the person committing the act knows that it is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and commits such act without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death or such injury as aforesaid.

(a) A shoots Z with the intention of killing him. Z dies in consequence. A commits murder.

(b) A, knowing that Z is labouring under such a disease that a blow is likely to cause his death, strikes him with the intention of causing bodily injury. Z dies in consequence of the blow. A is guilty of murder, although the blow might not have been sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause the death of a person in a sound state of health. But if A, not knowing that Z is labouring under any disease, gives him such a blow as would not in the ordinary course of nature kill a person in a sound state of health, here A, although he may intend to cause bodily injury, is not guilty of murder, if he did not intend to cause death or such bodily injury as in the ordinary course of nature would cause death.

(c) A intentionally gives Z a sword-cut or club-wound sufficient to cause the death of a man in the ordinary course of nature. Z dies in consequence. Here A is guilty of murder, although he may not have intended to cause Z's death.

(d) A without any excuse fires a loaded cannon into a crowd of persons and kills one of them. A is guilty of murder, although he may not have had a premeditated design to kill any particular individual.

Exception 1⁵.—Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, whilst deprived of the power of self-control by grave and sudden provocation, causes the death of the person who gave the provocation or causes the death of any other person by mistake or accident.

The above Exception is subject to the following provisos :—

First⁶.—That the provocation is not sought or voluntarily provoked by the offender as an excuse for killing or doing harm to any person.

*Secondly*⁷.—That the provocation is not given by anything done in obedience to the law, or by a public servant in the lawful exercise of the powers of such public servant.

*Thirdly*⁸.—That the provocation is not given by anything done in the lawful exercise of the right of private defence.

*Explanation*⁹.—Whether the provocation was grave and sudden enough to prevent the offence from amounting to murder is a question of fact.

(a) A, under the influence of passion excited by a provocation given by Z, intentionally kills Y, Z's child. This is murder, inasmuch as the provocation was not given by the child, and the death of the child was not caused by accident or misfortune in doing an act caused by the provocation.

(b) Y gives grave and sudden provocation to A. A, on this provocation, fires a pistol at Y, neither intending nor knowing himself to be likely to kill Z, who is near him, but out of sight. A kills Z. Here A has not committed murder, but merely culpable homicide.

(c) A is lawfully arrested by Z, a bailiff. A is excited to sudden and violent passion by the arrest, and kills Z. This is murder, inasmuch as the provocation was given by a thing done by a public servant in the exercise of his powers.

(d) A appears as a witness before Z, a Magistrate. Z says that he does not believe a word of A's deposition, and that A has perjured himself. A is moved to sudden passion by these words, and kills Z. This is murder.

(e) A attempts to pull Z's nose. Z, in the exercise of the right of private defence, lays hold of A to prevent him from doing so. A is moved to sudden and violent passion in consequence, and kills Z. This is murder, inasmuch as the provocation was given by a thing done in the exercise of the right of private defence.

(f) Z strikes B. B is by this provocation excited to violent rage. A, a bystander, intending to take advantage of B's rage, and to cause him to kill Z, puts a knife into B's hand for that purpose. B kills Z with the knife. Here B may have committed only culpable homicide, but A is guilty of murder.

*Exception 2*¹⁰.—Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, in the exercise in good faith of the right of private defence of person or property, exceeds the power given to him by law and causes the death of the person against whom he is exercising such right of the defence without premeditation, and without any intention of doing more harm than is necessary for the purpose of such defence.

ILLUSTRATION.

Z attempts to horsewhip A, not in such a manner as to cause grievous hurt to A. A draws out a pistol. Z persists in the assault. A, believing in good faith that he can by no other means prevent himself from being horsewhipped, shoots Z dead. A has not committed murder, but only culpable homicide.

*Exception 3*¹¹.—Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, being a public servant or aiding a public servant acting for the advancement of public justice, exceeds the powers given to him by law, and causes death by doing an act which he, in good faith, believes to be lawful and necessary for the due discharge of his duty as such public servant and without ill-will towards the person whose death is caused.

Exception 4.¹²—Culpable homicide is not murder if it is committed without premeditation in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel and without the offender's having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner.

Explanation.—It is immaterial in such cases which party offers the provocation or commits the first assault.

Exception 5.¹³—Culpable homicide is not murder when the person whose death is caused, being above the age of eighteen years, suffers death or takes the risk of death with his own consent.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, by instigation, voluntarily causes Z, a person under eighteen years of age, to commit suicide. Here, on account of Z's youth, he was incapable of giving consent to his own death; A has therefore abetted murder.

COMMENT.

Section 299 defines the offence of culpable homicide. This section says when culpable homicide amounts to murder. In the Penal Code 'culpable homicide' is used as a generic term, and is exhaustively sub-divided into two species, namely, culpable homicide amounting to murder (s. 300, cls. 1, 2, 3, 4) and culpable homicide not amounting to murder (s. 299 and Exceptions to s. 300). According to Sir Fitz-James Stephen the definitions of 'culpable homicide' and 'murder' are the weakest part of the Code as they are defined in terms closely resembling each other.

Culpable homicide is murder where the party inflicting the injury does it either with the intention that it should cause death or with the knowledge that it may do so. It will not be murder if the case falls within any of the Exceptions. Where there is neither intention, knowledge, nor likelihood that the injury will or can result in death, the offence would be neither murder, nor culpable homicide not amounting to murder, but would be voluntarily causing grievous hurt or hurt and the conviction in such a case would be either under s. 325 or s. 326 according to the nature of the weapon used²⁴ or under s. 323.

The Code nowhere makes premeditation a necessary concomitant to murder. Whatever the motive may be, or whether nor not any motive whatsoever be discoverable, the sole point for inquiry is, whether the person inflicting the injury did so with the intention or knowledge as specified in the section.²⁵

Scope.—An offence cannot amount to murder, unless it falls within the definition of culpable homicide; for this section merely points out the cases in which culpable homicide amounts to murder. But an offence may amount to 'culpable homicide and yet may not amount to murder.

In deciding the question whether culpable homicide amounts to murder, it will be erroneous to convict the accused of murder, simply because there is nothing to bring him under any of the exceptions reducing the offence to one not amounting to murder, and it is the duty of the Court to consider, in the first place, whether the element or elements which constitute the offence of murder, as defined in this section, exist.¹ In Queen v. Sheikh Bazu,² Peacock, C.J., observed: "It does not follow that a case of culpable homicide is murder, because it does not fall within any of the exceptions in s. 300. To render culpable homicide murder, the case must come within the provisions of clauses 1, 2, 3, or 4 of s. 300".

English law.—Murder is unlawfully causing the death of another with malice aforethought express or implied. Malice aforethought, in murder, practically means—

(1) An intent to kill or do grievous bodily harm to the person who is killed.

(2) An intent to kill or do grievous bodily harm to anyone else.

²⁴ See Ghulam Muhay-ud-din, (1921) 22 Cr. L. J. 658.

(3) An intent to do any criminal act which will probably cause death or grievous bodily harm to some one.

(4) An intent to oppose by force any officer of justice who is lawfully arresting or keeping in custody some one whom he is entitled to arrest or keep in custody, provided the accused knows that he is such officer of justice.

Throughout the web of the English criminal law one golden thread is always to be seen, that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the prisoner's guilt. In every charge of murder, if the prosecution have proved homicide, namely, the killing by the accused, the prosecution must prove further that the killing was malicious and murder, as there is no presumption that the act was malicious, and at no point of time in a criminal trial can a situation arise in which it is incumbent upon the accused to prove his innocence, subject to the defence of insanity and subject also to any statutory exception. Where intent is an ingredient of a crime there is no onus on the accused to prove that the act alleged was accidental.³

Culpable homicide and murder distinguished.—The distinction between these two offences is very ably set forth by Melvill, J., in Reg. v. Govinda,⁴ in which the accused knocked his wife down, put one knee on her chest, and struck her two or three violent blows on the face with the closed fist, producing extravasation of blood on the brain and she died in consequence. The Court held that there being no intention to cause death, and the bodily injury not being sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, the offence committed was not murder but culpable homicide. The learned Judge said :

"For convenience of comparison, the provisions of Sections 299 and 300 . . . may be stated thus :—

SECTION 299.

A person commits culpable homicide, if the act by which the death is caused is done

- (a) With the intention of causing death ;
- (b) With the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death ;
- (c) With the knowledge that . . . the act is likely to cause death.

SECTION 300.

Subject to certain exceptions, culpable homicide is murder, if the act by which the death is caused is done

- (1) With the intention of causing death ;
- (2) With the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused ;
- (3) With the intention of causing bodily injury to any person, and the bodily injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death ;
- (4) With the knowledge that the act is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.

"I have underlined the words which appear to be to mark the differences between the two offences.

(a) and (1) show that where there is an intention to kill, the offence is always murder.

"(c) and (4) appear to me intended to apply (I do not say that they are necessarily limited) to cases in which there is no intention to cause death or bodily injury. Furious driving, firing at a mark near a public road, would be cases of this description. Whether the offence is culpable homicide or murder, depends upon the degree of risk to human life. If death is a likely result, it is culpable homicide ; if it is the most probable result, it is murder.

"The essence of (2) appears to me to be found in the words which I have underlined. The offence is murder, if the offender knows that the particular person injured is likely, either from peculiarity of constitution, or immature age, or other special circumstances, to be killed by an injury which would not ordinarily cause death. The illustration given in the section is the following :—

'A, knowing that Z is labouring under such a disease that a blow is likely to cause his death, strikes him with the intention of causing bodily injury. Z dies in consequence of the blow. A is guilty of murder, although the blow might not have been sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause the death of a person in a sound state of health'.

"There remain to be considered (b) and (3), and it is on a comparison of these two clauses that the decision of doubtful cases . . . must generally depend. The offence is culpable homicide, if the bodily injury intended to be inflicted is likely to cause death ; it is murder, if such injury is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The distinction is fine, but appreciable. It is much the same distinction as that between (c) and (4), already noticed. It is a question of degree of probability. Practically, I think, it will generally resolve itself into a consideration of the nature of the weapon used. A blow from the fist or a stick on a vital part may be likely to cause death ; a wound from a sword in a vital part is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death".

The offence of culpable homicide by doing an act by which the death is caused "with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death" can exist independently of s. 300, though none of the Exceptions set out in s. 300 apply to the case. The first offence is punishable under the first part of s. 304 ; the latter under s. 302. Section 300 can only apply when it is established that the offender intended the injury to be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death or knew that in the special circumstances of the case not death merely, but the death of the particular person to whom the harm was caused, was likely.⁵

As regards (c) Peacock, C. J., observes in *Gora Chand Gopee's case*⁶ : "There are many cases falling within the words of s. 299 'or with the knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death' that do not fall within the 2nd, 3rd, or 4th clause, of s. 300, such for instance as the offences described in ss. 279, 280, 281, 282, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288 and 289, if the offender knows that his act or illegal omission is likely to cause death, and if in fact it does cause death. But, although he may know that the act or illegal omission is so dangerous that it is likely to cause death, it is not murder, even if death is caused thereby, unless the offender knows that it must in all probability cause death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, or unless he intends thereby to cause death or such bodily injury as is described in clause 2 or 3 of s. 300.

"As an illustration, suppose a gentleman should drive a buggy in a rash and negligent manner, or furiously along a narrow crowded street. He might know that he was likely to kill some person, but he might not intend to kill any one. In such a case, if he should cause death, I apprehend he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, unless it should be found as a fact that he knew that his act was so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death or such bodily injury, &c., as to bring the case within the 4th clause of s. 300. In an ordinary case of furious driving, the facts would scarcely warrant such a finding. . . If a man should drive a buggy furiously, not merely along a crowded street, but intentionally into the midst of a crowd of persons, it would probably be found as a fact that he knew that his act was so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death or such bodily injury, &c., as in clause 4, s. 300.

"From the fact of a man's doing an act with the knowledge that he is likely to cause death, it may be presumed that he did it with the intention of causing death, if all the circumstances of the case justify such a presumption ; but I should never presume an intention to cause death merely from the fact of furious driving in a crowded street in which the driver might know that his act would be likely to cause death. Presumption of intention must depend upon the facts of each particular case.

"Suppose a gentleman should cause death by furiously driving up to a Railway Station. Suppose it should be proved that he had business in a distant part of the country, say at the opposite terminus ; that he was intending to go by a particular train ; and that he could not arrive at his destination in time for his business by any other train ; that at the time of the furious driving it wanted only two minutes to the time of the train's starting ; that the road was so crowded that he must have known that he was likely to run over some one, and to cause death. Would any one under the circumstances presume that his intention was to cause death ? Would it not be more reasonable to presume that his intention was to save the train ? If the Judge or jury should find that his intention was to save the train, but that he must have known that he was likely to cause death, he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, unless they should also find that the risk of causing of death was such that he must have known, and did know, that his act must in all probability cause death, &c., within the meaning of clause 4, s. 300.

"If they should go further, and infer from the knowledge that he was likely to cause death, that he intended to cause death, he would be guilty of murder, and liable to capital punishment".

Plowden, J., in Barkatulla's case said: "It may be useful here to point out that the Indian Penal Code contemplates that when an act is culpable homicide, whether amounting to murder, or not amounting to murder, by reason of the act being done with the knowledge described in clause 3 of s. 299 (or with the knowledge described in clause 4 of s. 300, which knowledge satisfies the definition of clause 3 of s. 299), an intention to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death must be absent. When intention of either kind co-exists with the knowledge described, the knowledge merges in the intention, and a higher degree of guilt is imputable. That the degree of guilt is higher when a murderous intention exists (which intention seems to be deemed to import the specified knowledge), and is lower when the knowledge is unaccompanied by such intention, seems a necessary inference from the language of s. 304 as to punishment."⁷

"Putting it shortly, all acts of killing done with the intention to kill, or to inflict bodily injury likely to cause death, or with the knowledge that death must be the most probable result, are prima facie murder, while those committed with the knowledge that death will be a likely result are culpable homicide not amounting to murder."⁸

Where, therefore, the act of the accused does not fall within the first clause of s. 300, that is, where the act was done not with the intention of causing death, the difference between culpable homicide and murder is merely a question of different degrees of probability that death would ensue. It is culpable homicide where death must have been known to be a probable result. It is murder, where it must have been known to be the most probable result.

Culpable homicide may, therefore, not be murder (1) where notwithstanding that the mental state is sufficient to constitute murder, one of the Exceptions to s. 300 applies, or (2) where the mental state, though within the description of s. 299, is not of the special degree of criminality required by s. 300.

In cases where it is difficult to determine whether the offence committed by the accused is culpable homicide or culpable homicide amounting to murder, the accused should be convicted of the lesser offence.⁹

1. Clause 1.—‘Act by which the death is caused is done with the intention of causing death’.—The word ‘act’ includes omissions as well (s. 33). See Comment on s. 299. Any omission by which death is caused will be punishable as if the death is caused directly by an act. Thus, if a person neglects to provide his child with proper sustenance, although repeatedly warned of the consequences, and the child dies, it will be murder.¹⁰

‘Death’ means the death of a human being (s. 46). It will be murder whether death is caused of a grown-up person or a newly-born child.¹¹

As to ‘intention’ see Comment on s. 299, supra. Where the intention to kill is present, the act amounts to murder; where such an intention is absent, the act amounts to culpable homicide not amounting to murder. To determine what the intention of the offender is, each case must be decided on its own merits. Where it is proved that the accused fired a gun shot at such a close range that it could not have had other than a fatal effect and it is indicative of the intention of the accused that after firing at one person he reloaded the gun and fired another shot at another person there is a clear indication of his intention to commit murder.¹² Where a person fires two shots successively at another person his murderous intent is clearly evident.¹³ The law looks as regards intention to the natural result of a man's act and not to the condition of his mind. From a legal point of view a person intends whatever he gives others reasonable grounds for supposing that he does intend. Where a man strikes lathi blows on the head of the deceased mercilessly and practically kills him on the spot, he is guilty of murder.¹⁴ Where a man stabs another in a vital part he must be held to have intended to cause death, and if death ensues either directly from the wound or in consequence of the wound creating conditions, which give occasion to the appearance of a fatal disease, the person inflicting the wound is guilty of murder.¹⁵ Absence of premeditation will not reduce the crime of murder to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁶ But where there is nothing more than a fatal result to indicate an intention to cause death and no weapon is used, it is unsafe to convict of murder.¹⁷

To be at a person after he has fallen down does not necessarily prove the intention of causing his death. Certain factors will have to be considered, such as for instance the number of blows, the nature of those blows and the parts of the body on which those blows have been inflicted. It may also be of importance to know what the condition of the injured person was when he fell down. If there could be no doubt about his serious condition, for instance if blood was flowing from his head or body and he was apparently unconscious, the striking of further blows, even on his body, though such blows might not ordinarily be dangerous, would indicate an intention on the part of his assailants to cause him more injury than would be caused by an ordinary beating, for the intention to give a beating would already have been more than given effect to, and a man in that condition would be less likely to survive if further blows were given, the shock to his system being aggravated by the additional blows.¹⁸

If there was a joint attack with dangerous weapons by four or five persons on one man and the latter died almost on the spot as a result of the injuries inflicted on him, at least the offence of culpable homicide must be said to have been made out, and the mere fact that it is not possible to say who inflicted the fatal injury would not be sufficient to support a finding that even the offence of culpable homicide has not been committed.¹⁹

If a person intends to cause the death of another and does an act in furtherance of that intention, which act does not in fact cause the death intended, and in the belief that the said act has caused death, he does another act, for the purpose of hiding the traces of the crime, and such act results in death, the offender can be convicted of murder. Where it appeared that the accused deliberately intended to kill the wife of one of them, that they decoyed her to a certain place and after an attempt to strangle her, dragged her immediately either in an unconscious or semi-conscious condition on to the railway line and placed her in front of the train and she was decapitated by the train, it was held that the accused were guilty of murder. The two acts were intimately connected with each other and the latter act followed immediately upon the former, that both the acts of the accused must be treated as being only one transaction, the transaction being to kill the deceased.²⁰ The Madras High Court has thus agreed with the dissenting view of Parsons, J., in Khandu's case,²¹ distinguishing an earlier full bench case in which the accused struck his wife a blow on her head with a plough-share which, though not shown to be a blow likely to cause death, did in fact render her unconscious and, believing her to be dead, in order to lay the foundation of a false defence of suicide by hanging, he hanged her on a beam by a rope and thereby caused her death by strangulation, and it was held that he was not guilty of either murder or culpable homicide not amounting to murder but was guilty of grievous hurt.²² This case was distinguished in a subsequent case on the ground that it was not shown that the blow on the deceased's head with a ploughshare was likely to cause death. The main point of distinction between the two cases is this, that in the full bench case there was never at any time an intention to cause death. The original intention was only to cause injury. The second intention was only to dispose of a supposedly dead body to shield himself. In Kaliappa's case there was at the beginning an intention to cause death. The accused attacked the deceased and caused three punctured wounds on her head and threw her body into a well. The medical evidence showed that the wounds by themselves were not sufficient to cause death. It was held that since the intention to cause death was evident even from the beginning, and such intention was apparently completely carried out into effect though not in fact at the first stage, and since the act was closely connected in time and space with the next act of throwing the body into a well and the result of the actions taken as a whole was clearly to carry out the intention to kill with which intention they began to act, the conviction for murder was therefore right.²³ Similarly the Patna High Court, following this case, held in a case in which the accused strangled a woman and on her becoming unconscious put her on a railway line and she was cut into two by a passing train that the accused was guilty of murder as from the very beginning there was a clear intention to cause death and the mere fact that the earlier assault did not result in death and that the accused was killed by a passing train where she had been placed by the accused would make no difference.²⁴

In Khandu's case a man struck another on the head with a stick, and believing him to be dead set fire to the hut with a view to remove all evidence of the crime and it was found that the blow only stunned the deceased and the death was really caused by the injuries from the burning when the accused set fire to the hut. It was held that the offence committed was that of attempt to murder. Parsons, J., who gave a dissenting judgment, was of opinion that the offence of murder was committed. The Patna High Court has also followed the opinion of Parsons, J. Where the accused assaulted a woman with the intention of causing death, and thereafter placed her body on a railway line where she was run over by a train, and the medical opinion favoured the view that the actual cause of death had been decapitation but there was no evidence that the accused, when he carried the body to the railway line, was under the belief that the woman was dead and that he was handling a dead body, it was held that the accused was guilty of murder.²⁵ It has laid down that where an accused person commits two (or more) acts closely following upon and intimately connected with each other, they cannot be separated and assigned the one to the one intention and the other to another, but both must be ascribed to the original intention which prompted the commission of those acts and without which neither could have been done.¹

The Calcutta High Court has followed the majority view in Khandu's case. The accused assaulted his wife and gave her kicks, blows and slaps. The kicks were given below the naval. The woman fell down and became unconscious. In order to create an appearance that the woman had committed suicide, the accused took up the unconscious body of his wife, thinking it to be a dead body, and hung it by a rope. The post mortem examination showed that death was due to hanging. It was held that the accused could not have intended to kill his wife, if he thought that she was already dead, and he could not be convicted of murder; and that the offence committed was one under s. 325 for having given her kicks, blows and slaps before she fell down.²

The question of finding out the intention of a particular person who together with others had admittedly committed a crime of violence, is always a difficult one. In the absence of direct evidence of the common intention, which is available only in rare cases, such an intention can only be ascertained by a consideration of the established facts and the surrounding circumstances.³

after they knocked him down continued to beat him with lathis causing his death;⁵ where the accused struck the deceased with such determination that when the stick broke he armed himself with another weapon and chased the deceased into another man's compound and assaulted him with the second weapon;⁶ and where a man struck the deceased on the head with a formidable lathi and fractured his skull,⁷ it was held that murder was committed.

The accused sent a box to the deceased, with whom he was at enmity, with a letter asking him to open the box, examine its contents and send it on to a person whose name and address was pasted on the box. When the deceased opened the box, the mechanism of the box ignited the explosives in the box, and the deceased, his wife, and two daughters died as the result of the explosion. The accused was on these facts convicted of culpable homicide amounting to murder.⁸

A man was shot in the abdomen with a gun in the course of a dacoity and died from acute peritonitis caused by the perforation of the gut. He died on the third day, having been first operated on at a railway hospital where he was sent by train and having been operated on a second time at Calcutta to reach where he underwent a further railway journey of about ten hours. The only evidence as to the manner of shooting was that a companion of the man who fired the gun flashed a torch-light on the victim and then he was fired at. Every gunner had similarly attached to him a lightman and other men were also shot as a torch-light was flashed on them, but all in lower parts of the body. The medical evidence was that peritonitis is not invariably caused by the perforation of the gut and that death had been due to exhaustion caused by the injuries, by which was meant continued external irritation, depressing the normal function of respiration and circulation. It was held that, in the circumstances, the act of firing was not murder.⁹

Neglect to provide medical aid or food.—Infants.—Where M was convicted of the manslaughter of his son of tender years, who died of confluent small-pox, and M, though able to do so, did not, owing to certain religious views he held, employ any medical practitioner, nor afford to the child during its illness any medical aid or attendance, and it was proved that proper medical aid and attendance might have saved or prolonged the child's life, it was held that the conviction could not be sustained. Lord Coleridge, C. J., said: "It is not enough to shew neglect of reasonable means for preserving or prolonging the child's life, but to convict of manslaughter it must be shewn that the neglect had the effect of shortening life. . . In order to sustain the conviction affirmative proof is required".¹⁰ In an earlier case it was distinctly shown, and found by the jury, that the child's death was caused by the neglect to provide medical aid, and therefore the conviction for manslaughter was upheld.¹¹ Where the death of a child was caused by neglect to supply him with proper nourishment, it was said that mere negligence would not do, there must be wicked negligence.¹² These cases are decided under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, which is in force in England. To warrant the conviction of a woman for manslaughter of her new-born child, whose death is caused by want of proper care at birth, it is not enough to show that such woman was guilty of criminal negligence by purposely arranging to be unattended at her confinement. She must also be proved to have been further guilty of negligence towards the child after it was completely born.¹³

Adults.—A girl of eighteen was taken in labour in the house of her step-father. The mother did not procure the aid of a midwife, in consequence of which the daughter died. The evidence did not show that she had means to pay the midwife. It was held that she was not legally bound to procure the aid of a midwife and that she could not be convicted of manslaughter.¹⁴ Where a mistress omitted to supply her servant with proper food and lodging and so caused her death, it was remarked : "The law clearly is that, if a person has the custody and charge of another and neglects to supply proper food and lodging, such person is responsible, if from such neglect death results to the person in custody ; but it is also equally clear that, when a person, having the free control of her actions and able to take care of herself, remains in a service where she is starved and badly lodged, the mistress is not criminally responsible for any consequences that may ensue".¹⁵ The accused, a woman of full age and without any means of her own, lived with, and was maintained by, the deceased, her old aunt. No one lived with them. For the last ten days of her life the deceased suffered from a disease which prevented her from moving or doing anything to procure assistance; during this time the accused lived in the house and took in the food supplied by the tradesman, but, apparently gave none of it to the deceased, nor did she procure for her any medical or nursing attendance, or inform any one of the condition of the deceased. The death of the deceased was substantially accelerated by want of food, nursing, and medical attendance. It was held that a duty was imposed upon the accused under the circumstances to supply the deceased with sufficient food to maintain life, and that, the death of the deceased having been accelerated by the neglect of such duty, the accused was guilty of manslaughter.¹⁶

Mere presence not sufficient for conviction of murder : common intention necessary.—Mere presence as a member of a gang which has committed murder is insufficient to support a conviction for murder. It must be shown that murder was the common object of the gang and that the accused did some act in furtherance of the common object.¹⁷ Where the accused are present at the time of a murder and thereby give moral support to it, they are as much guilty of murder as the murderer himself.¹⁸ Where the accused, a menial servant, accompanied his master with the intention of rendering such assistance as might be required when the latter had announced his intention of committing murder, it was held that the accused was guilty of murder.¹⁹ Where a blow was struck by A in the presence of, and by the order of, B, both were held to be principals in the transaction ; and where two persons joined in beating a man, and he died, it was held not necessary to ascertain exactly what the effect of each blow was.²⁰

2. Clause 2.—‘With the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death.’—See Comment on s. 299. In order to convict a person of the offence of murder under this clause it has to be found that he had the intention of causing the injury and also that he had the knowledge that the injury which he intended to inflict was likely to cause death. The word ‘knowledge’ imports a certainty and not merely a probability.²¹ If a man strikes another on the head with a stick when he is asleep, and fractures his skull, knowledge of likelihood of causing death must be presumed; and the offence committed is murder.²² As to the intention to be presumed in cases of blows on the head with a stick, instinct at least, if not knowledge and experience, tells every man that to hit another human being any violent blow on the head may possibly result or is likely to result or will probably result in serious injury to the person struck, but knowledge, belief or expectation of the amount of injury that may be caused must depend upon what is used in inflicting the blow and the force with which the blow is delivered. Repeated blows or even a single blow forcibly delivered with a heavy weapon would make the offence a murder, but where a sudden blow is struck with a stick that is not heavy, the offence would be culpable homicide not amounting to murder.²³ Even a most illiterate and ignorant person will realise that a savage blow with an axe in the region of the abdomen and spine is bound to cause death or injury which will result in death.²⁴

This clause also applies in special cases where the person injured is in such a condition or state of health that his death would be likely to be caused by an injury which would not ordinarily cause the death of a person in sound health, and where the person inflicting the injury knows that owing to such condition or state of health it is likely to cause the death of the person injured.²⁵

Cases—Where A several times kicked B, who, after having been severely beaten, fell down senseless, it was held that A was guilty of murder as he must have known that such kicks were likely to cause death in B's state at that time.¹ Where two persons set upon an unarmed man and beat him with sticks so severely that he died within a few minutes they were held guilty of murder.² Where two men pursued an old man and each of them gave him a blow on the head with such force that his skull was cracked, it was held that both of them were guilty of murder.³ Where four men beat another so severely that death ensued from the injuries received, it was held that they must be presumed to have known that by such acts they were likely to cause death, and that the offence of murder was not reduced to culpable homicide not amounting to murder by the absence of intention to cause death.⁴ A cut Z on the head, with a heavy chopper, slicing off a bit of the frontal bone and cutting the brain. Z died from the effect of the injury, but the medical evidence showed that the wound was not certain, although likely, to cause death. It was held that A's intention must be inferred not merely from the actual consequences of his act, but from the act itself, and as the natural consequence of an act of the kind in question would be death, A must be presumed to have intended to cause death.⁵ Where a person struck the deceased with a highly lethal weapon with the knowledge that the act was such as was likely to cause death, he was held guilty of murder.⁶ It was held likewise where a blow was given with a bottle full of liquid.⁷ A body of six persons attacked another with cattle goads in a violent and determined manner, inflicting sixteen wounds on his body and causing several and severe ruptures of his spleen, and so caused his death. The person attacked was a strongly-built man of thirty-five years of age, and his spleen was in a healthy state. It was held that such acts, committed by several persons on one, in such a manner, apparently regardless of the consequences, and with such results, warranted the inference that the acts were done by those persons with the intention either of causing the death of the person attacked or such injuries as the offenders knew to be likely to cause his death; and that the offence amounted to murder.⁸

The two accused, brothers, between whom and the deceased and his son was bad feeling, came upon the deceased in the fields and setting upon him, beat him with sticks so severely that he died within a few minutes, no less than fourteen ribs being fractured resulting in the rupture of both lungs and of the spleen. It was held that the crime fell under the first or second clause of s. 300 as the intention was clear whether to kill or to cause a dangerous injury and thus the case was taken out of the purview of clause 4 which applied to cases in which there was no wish to kill or to hurt.⁹ Where in continuation of an altercation which had taken place earlier in the day between the mother of the accused and the wife of the deceased the two men were struggling in front of their houses when the accused suddenly struck the deceased with a weapon which was variously described as a spear-head or a sickle and the medical evidence showed that the person of the deceased bore two wounds of penetrating nature one of which completely perforated the heart; the other penetrating the abdomen on the left side had divided intestines, it was held that having regard to the nature of the wounds inflicted it must be deemed that his intention was, if not to cause death, at least to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death.¹⁰

In the course of a murderous attack on his wife by the accused, the former ran to the deceased woman for protection and clasped her arms round her waist. The accused thereupon gave a fatal stab to the deceased with the sole object of making her let go his wife, so that he might wreak his vengeance on her. The accused had no quarrel with the deceased and had no intention of killing her. It was held that the accused was only guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, as he did not intend to inflict such injury on the deceased as was likely to cause her death or was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause her death.¹¹ A attacked his mother-in-law, Y, a woman of fifty-five, with an edged instrument but by mistake cut another woman, Z, on the arm. Z, who was sixty-one years of age, died from the effects of the wound, although the Civil Surgeon considered that the injury was not sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death to a woman of her age. The Sessions Judge considered that this clause was applicable on account of Y's age. It was held that this clause was not applicable because (1) as the injury was actually caused to Z, although intended for Y, Y's age did not affect the question at all, and (2) in view of the medical evidence and of the fact that the injury was not on a vital part of the body, A could not be held to have intended such bodily injury as he knew to be likely to cause the death of either Y or Z, or such bodily injury as was likely to cause death.¹²

Four coolies of a tea estate, thinking that another person had by sorcery made one of them dumb, set upon him while he was sitting in a courtyard. One of them finding a knife in the pocket of the victim took it out and stabbed him fatally. All the four dragged him and buried him in a well. It was held that all the accused having taken part in the affray from the beginning with the intention to kill the deceased, all the four were guilty of murder.¹³

Dhatūra poisoning.—Where a woman of twenty years of age was found to have administered dhatūra (a poisonous herb) to three members of her family, who ultimately recovered, it was held that she was guilty of attempt to commit murder as she must be presumed to have known that the administration of dhatūra was likely to cause death, although she might not have administered it with that intention.¹⁴ It is not clear from the judgment in this case how the Court came to that finding, as it was held that although the accused knew that she might cause death she had no intention to do so, but intended only to incapacitate temporarily the persons to whom she administered the dhatūra in order that she might run away with her lover. The same High Court in a subsequent case said: "Dhatūra is not exactly a deadly poison, and may often be given for the purpose of merely stupefying a victim" (p. 571). On this ground it held, where, for the purpose of facilitating robbery, dhatūra was administered by two persons to certain travellers, in consequence of which one of the travellers died and others were made seriously ill, that, in respect of the traveller who died, the offence committed was that of grievous hurt (s. 325), and, in respect of the travellers who did not die, the offence committed was that under s. 328.¹⁵ This case is of doubtful authority. The same High Court has now laid down that a person who recklessly administers dhatūra to another is guilty, if death ensue, of the offence of murder, and not merely of culpable homicide not amounting to murder or of grievous hurt.¹⁶ Where dhatūra was administered with the object of facilitating robbery but in such quantity that the person to whom it was given died in the course of a few hours, it was held that the person so administering dhatūra was guilty of murder.¹⁷ The former Chief Court of the Punjab followed this decision in a case in which the accused administered dhatūra to A and B, both of whom died from the effects thereof and on the following day he administered the same poison to C and D, the former got ill and recovered, but the latter died. It held that the accused was guilty of murder, for, when he administered dhatūra poison he committed an act which, even if not committed with the intention of causing death or causing bodily injury likely, to the knowledge of the offender, or in the ordinary course of nature sufficient, to cause death, was so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death; and that the accused was guilty of an offence under s. 307 as regards the poison administered to C. The Court observed : "It would be putting a premium on murder to hold that the giving of dhatura in this reckless fashion is comparatively a minor offence. We cannot agree with the dicta in the judgment of the Allahabad High Court in the case of *Emperor v. Bhagwan Din*¹⁸ and we prefer, in the interests of public safety, to follow the ruling of the same High Court in the case of Emperor v. Gutali.¹⁹ As remarked by the learned Judges in the latter case, 'Although death does not always follow from dhatura poisoning, yet it does follow in a considerable proportion of cases' ".²⁰ In this case it was found by the Court that the accused was an expert in dhatura poisoning and knew well that the poison worked in a most effective and dangerous manner upon his victims. But where the accused caused the death of two persons by administering to them dhatura in order to facilitate the commission of robbery, the same Court, in another case, held that they were guilty of an offence under s. 326 and not under s. 302. It said that "no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to the section of the Indian Penal Code applicable, and that the circumstances of the particular case must be taken into consideration." It further observed that it had not been shown that the accused administered dhatura with such intention or knowledge as would make them guilty of murder.²¹ In case of murder by dhatura poisoning it is to be determined with what object it is administered. Its use may be merely in order to facilitate the commission of robbery and it does not per se and necessarily import contemplation of the victim's death as a means towards, or as incidental to, the main end of that offence. The point is to be decided with regard to the circumstances of each case and the best indication of the intention of the offender can be gathered from the amount of dhatura which he administers. Where a large quantity of dhatura is administered the offender shall be presumed to intend to cause the death of the victim for the successful termination of his crime.²²

The Bombay High Court has followed the rulings in *Q.-E. v. Tulsha, Emp. v. Gutali, Emp. v. Gauri Shankar*²³ and Emp. v. Nanhui, and has dissented from Emp. v. Bhagwan Din. The accused administered dhatura to five men for the purpose of facilitating the commission of robbery. Three of them died and the remaining two were taken seriously ill and regained consciousness after four days. The Sessions Judge convicted them under s. 325, for causing the death of three men; and under s. 328 for administering the poisonous substance to the other two. He acquitted them of the charge under s. 302 for causing the death of the three men as he held that there were no sufficient grounds for holding that the accused knew that they were likely to cause death by the administration of dhatura. It was held, setting aside the acquittal, that the accused were guilty of murder under cl. (4) of s. 300, as they had sufficient knowledge of the fact that administering dhatura often resulted in death and was likely to cause death.²⁴ The Court observed : "Having regard to the extent to which dhatura poisoning does take place in India, both in the case of men and cattle, there is very adequate ground for attributing, at any rate, to ordinary Indian villagers a knowledge of the dangerous results that may occur from administering dhatura."²⁵ "In the cases of adult persons...deliberately administering dhatura or some such poison or deleterious substance, and in quantities such as to kill three persons within a few hours on the spot, the burden is heavily on the accused to show why the ordinary presumption from an act so imminently dangerous and so probably fatal should not be drawn...Persons making use of poisons which, besides being intoxicants, may likewise prove fatal if administered in sufficient quantity, cannot escape the fatal consequences of this reckless administration, without showing that they were not possessed of the ordinary knowledge of adults, which even villagers are presumed to possess."¹ The Nagpur High Court has adopted the same view.²

In the case of dhatura poisoning, the contention, that in the absence of proof that the deceased was subject to a fatal dose of the poison, death as a result of that poison cannot be presumed, is without force.³

The accused gave some food with which dhatura was mixed to three persons in order to rob them. The three men were found next morning lying out in the open in a state of coma, or unconsciousness and they were taken to the hospital. Two of them recovered but the third developed pneumonia and died. It was held that the accused were not guilty of murder since it was not shown that pneumonia was a likely consequence of the administration of dhatura, nor was it established that the pneumonia was caused by the exposure or was a probable consequence of sleeping out. The accused were held to be guilty under s. 328.⁴

Aconite.—The accused gave a large quantity of aconite to a young married girl, and the girl, under the impression that her husband would begin to love her and consent to send her to her parents if he could be made to take the said substance with his food, mixed the same with the mid-day meal of the whole family. On eating the food, the husband's father and an elder brother died. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section and s. 115.⁵ Where a wife, not knowing the dangerous properties of aconite powder, administered it to her husband by mixing it with his food and in consequence the husband died, the Madras High Court held that she could not be found guilty of murder, but inasmuch as her intention was to cause bodily infirmity to her husband by depriving him of his will power and so bringing him completely under her domination, she committed an offence under s. 328.⁶

Arsenic.—A person who administers a well-known poison like arsenic to another must be taken to know that his act is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and, if death ensues, he is guilty of murder, notwithstanding that his intention may not have been to cause death. Where the accused administered arsenic to a boy nine years of age with the object of preventing the father of the boy from appearing as a witness against himself in a criminal case, but in such quantity that the boy died in the course of three days, it was held that he was guilty of murder, though his intention might not have been to cause death.⁷ Where a woman of middle age administered to her husband arsenic disguised in sugar and placed in his food and thereby caused his death, it was held that she must be taken to know that her act was so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death or such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, and she was guilty of murder and not under s. 304A, notwithstanding that her intention might not have been to cause death.⁸ The accused sent sweetmeat poisoned with arsenic to A, with the intention of causing her death, and A, as well as D and C to whom she gave a part of the sweetmeat, all became seriously ill as a consequence of partaking of it but they all recovered from the effect of the poison. It was held that the accused was guilty of attempting to murder B and C as well.⁹

3. Clause 3.—'With the intention of causing bodily injury to any person... sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.'—Where bodily injuries intended to be inflicted are sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death the offence falls under this clause.¹⁰ The distinction between this clause and clause (2) of s. 299 depends upon the degree of probability of death from the act committed. If from the intentional act of injury committed the probability of death resulting is high, the finding should be that the accused intended to cause death or injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death and the conviction should be of murder; if there was probability in a less degree of death ensuing from the act committed, the finding should be that the accused intended to cause injury likely to cause death and the conviction should be of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹¹ It is not correct to say that an injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death is an injury, which inevitably and in all circumstances must cause death. If the probability of death is very great, the requirements of this clause are satisfied, and the fact that a particular individual may by the fortunate accident of his having secured specially skilled treatment, or being in possession of a particularly strong constitution have survived an injury which would prove fatal to the majority of persons subjected to it, is not enough to prove that such an injury is not sufficient "in the ordinary course of nature" to cause death.¹² If a person knowingly causes injuries which are more likely to cause death than not in the ordinary way, his offence falls under either the second or third clause.¹³ In the case of some classes of injuries, it is easy to say what was intended; for instance, in a wound with a knife in the abdomen. A man who inflicts such a wound intends to inflict a wound which we must know will be dangerous to life. But in the case of wounds with blunt instruments, the intention is not so clear. The effect of a severe blow upon one man will be very different from what it will be upon another, and it does not follow, when the victim dies, that it was intended to inflict such injury as is sufficient to cause death. A Judge must always find whether the bodily injury inflicted was that which was intended by the accused.¹⁴

The words of s. 299 "or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death" amount to murder only when it can be held that the likelihood of death is so great that the bodily injury intended to be inflicted must be held to be an injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death so as to bring the case within the third clause of s. 300. Where the likelihood is not sufficiently high, the offence is that of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁵ In cases of death caused by reckless violence the nature of the weapon used is a test for deciding whether the crime falls under s. 299 or this clause.¹⁶ The nature of the material object used and the force used are useful guides in arriving at a decision as to whether the intention and knowledge required by this section can be attributed to the accused.¹⁷ The accused savagely attacked and wounded with a hatchet their cousin, who was laid up with fever in consequence of the wounds for about forty days and ultimately died of blood poisoning. It was held that the accused were guilty of murder, the wounds inflicted by them being the cause of death.¹⁸ Where a person received grievous injuries and was detained in hospital and as a result of these injuries pneumonia supervened and the victim died, it was held that those who caused the injuries were guilty of murder.¹⁹ Where in a trial for murder, the medical evidence was that the injuries inflicted on the deceased were not necessarily sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, and that death was due to meningitis and compression of the brain but this had no direct connection with the injuries, it was held that the offence fell under s. 326 and not under s. 302.²⁰

It cannot always be assumed that, when a man strikes a blow on the head, he intends to cause death or injury sufficient to cause death or even injury likely to cause death.²¹ Owing to a quarrel which the deceased had with the accused, the latter armed himself with an iron-shod stick and struck one blow with it on the head of the deceased which caused his death. He was convicted of murder. It was held that, inasmuch as it was possible that the blow struck by the accused exceeded in violence the injury he had in view at the moment of striking it, the conviction should be altered from murder to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.²² The reasoning in this case has been criticised on the ground that the ordinary rule in criminal cases is that intention must be inferred from a person's acts. The Madras High Court has not followed this decision in a case in which during an exchange of abuse, the accused hit the deceased with a deadly weapon—a rice-pounder—which caused her death, but there was nothing in the evidence to show that he had a motive in killing the deceased and equally there was no doubt that he intended to inflict the injury and that he must have known that such an injury was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature.²³ Where the accused in the course of an altercation dealt a blow with a dharia (scythe) on the head of the deceased with the result that it penetrated the skull, it was held that the accused was guilty of murder.²⁴ Where a person struck a blow on the head with a deadly weapon and with such violence as to cut through the skull, it was held that he did so with the intention of causing death or such bodily injury as was likely to cause death and was guilty of murder.²⁵

Cases.—Stabbing in vital part.—The accused stabbed the deceased with a dagger in the back. The wound, though not severe, was in such a part of the body, that it was considered dangerous; but the dagger did not penetrate to any great length. The wound healed in about seven days, at the end of which time symptoms indicative of tetanus were observed and the deceased died from that cause on the following day. According to the medical evidence in the case, tetanus was caused by a bacillus, which entered the body through the breach of surface, caused by a wound. It was held that there was no reasonable doubt that tetanus, which was the cause of the death of the deceased, was due to the wound inflicted by the accused; that when there was a natural explanation of the appearance of tetanus, it was unreasonable to conjecture that tetanus might have resulted independently of the normal cause, and had been the effect of some rare and unexplained conditions.¹ The accused inflicted a stab with a sharp-pointed weapon which entered the upper part of the deceased's stomach, causing rupture of it and of the peritoneum, it was held that his act came within this clause.² If a person stabs another in the abdomen with sufficient force to penetrate the abdominal walls and the internal viscera, he must undoubtedly be held, whatever his station in life, to have intended to cause injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.³

An ordinary person is not presumed to know the precise location of the arteries in the human limbs. If, therefore, a stab with a knife or dagger, aimed at an arm or a leg, severs an artery and the injured man dies as a result, it may be quite reasonable to argue that the offence is not one of culpable homicide and that the assailant can only be presumed to have intended to cause hurt or grievous hurt with a dangerous weapon. The case is quite different when a weapon like a sword is used in order to chop off or heck at a limb. The person who uses a sword or arwal chopping at an arm or a leg and by so doing severs the arteries of the arm or the leg, must know that he is inflicting an injury which in the ordinary course of nature is sufficient to cause death. The offence in that case is clearly murder.⁴ Where the accused stabbed the deceased on a vital part of the body and the deceased died as a result of that injury and the injury was one which in the ordinary course would have caused death, it was held that the accused was guilty of murder. The mere fact that the deceased might have been saved if expert medical attention had been afforded at once makes no difference as to the nature of the crime.⁵

Murderous assault.—A man who has either hacked a fellow-creature about in a most merciless fashion or has practically pounded him to death, cannot escape conviction of murder merely by urging that he was careful to avoid injuring a vital part.⁶ Where the accused caused the death of another person by giving him unmerciful thrashing with sticks, smashing both bones of each forearm, the right elbow and right knee-cap, and the occipital area on the right temporal area of the skull, it was held that he was guilty of murder.⁷ The accused killed a person by striking him one blow on the head with a long and heavy bamboo. The nature of the injury indicated that very great force was used. It was held that although the weapon used was not one that would of necessity cause fatal injury, the force used was so great as to show that the accused intended to cause injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, and that he was guilty of murder.⁸ There can be no doubt that a person delivering a violent blow with a lethal weapon like a dang (club) on a vulnerable part of the body such as the head must be deemed to have intended to cause such bodily injury as he knew was likely to cause the death of the person to whom the injury was caused.⁹ The accused was bathing in the street in front of his house causing "slush" in the road. The person living in a house opposite protested and in the course of the quarrel the waterpot of the accused was broken. The accused then went into his house shouting abuse and brought a rice-pounder, which was a heavy piece of wood, two yards long and about three inches in diameter. He struck that person with it on the head causing a contused wound rendering him unconscious. Then the aunt of that person intervened. The accused struck her also on the head with the rice-pounder. She fell down unconscious and bleeding and died seven days later owing to fracture of the skull. It was held that the case came within ill. (c) to this section and that the accused was guilty of murder.¹⁰ Where the accused committed an unprovoked and cowardly assault upon the deceased rushing out at him by surprise and striking him one blow upon the head with a lathi (club) and the blow fractured his skull from temple to temple, it was held that the accused was guilty of murder.¹¹ In the course of a riot the accused attacked and killed a man with dangerous weapons. It was held that the acts of the accused having caused the death of the man, and there being nothing to suggest that they were not sufficient to cause death as their ordinary and natural result, in the absence of proof of circumstances sufficient to give the accused the benefit of any of the exceptions, they must be taken to have intended to kill the man.¹² Where two men together repeatedly struck another on his head with lathis with sufficient force to break his skull in several places, it was held that they were guilty of murder for their intention could not be other than to inflict such injury as was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.¹³ The accused inflicted wounds with an vettaruwal (an instrument of cutting) on the deceased and the wounds were such as cumulatively would have caused death in a normal man. But because the deceased was well-built it appeared that they need not have proved fatal and that he might have escaped death but for the supervening septicaemia and pyæmia (blood poisoning). It was held that the accused was guilty of murder as his intention to cause death was evident and the cause of death was directly associated with the act.¹⁴

Intoxication.—Two men met each other in a drunken state, and commenced a quarrel, during which they abused each other. This lasted for about half an hour, when one of them ran to his own house, and came back with a heavy pestle with which he struck the other a violent blow on the left temple causing instant death. It was held that the offence fell within clauses (2) and (3).¹⁵ Intoxication is no excuse for a man throttling to death another and a weaker man who is intoxicated also.¹⁶ Voluntary drunkenness, though it does not palliate any offence, may be taken into account as throwing light on the question of intention.¹⁷ It may also be considered in estimating the probable effect on the mind of the accused of the words or actions of others, and in determining whether the provocation given was grave and sudden.¹⁸ Where death was caused by an act done while in a state of intoxication, voluntarily induced, and the accused was convicted of causing grievous hurt, it was held that the accused should have been charged with culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁹

Injury sufficient to cause death.—The accused after an altercation smote the deceased with great force on the leg above the ankle with his dah with such force that he cut through the bones and the arteries. As a result the man died four days later in a hospital. It was held that the accused did in fact inflict injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, but the intention to cause such injury or the knowledge that he must inflict such injury could not be imputed to him. A man who directs a blow on the leg, especially near the ankle, does not, as a general rule, intend to cause injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. But as the accused struck a very violent blow with a formidable weapon it was held that he must have known that the injury he would inflict was likely to cause death, and he was, therefore, guilty under s. 304, part one.²⁰

4. Clause 4.—‘Person committing the act knows that it is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, . . . without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death’.—This clause cannot be applied until it is clear that clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the section each and all of them fail to suit the circumstances.²¹ It does not apply to a case in which death has been caused by an act done with the intention of causing bodily injury to a particular person. In such a case the question whether the offence is murder or not must be decided by reference to the first three clauses of the section and the exceptions.²² In some of the decided cases this distinction has not been observed and where the weapon used is of a dangerous nature this clause has been applied. The cases in which this clause has any application are extremely rare, and though it is not easy to attempt to define with any strictness the kind of cases in which that clause comes in, there is one broad distinction between it and the first three clauses—in the first three clauses the important thing is an intention to kill or to hurt, while the fourth clause says nothing about intention.²³

‘To cause death merely by doing an act with the knowledge that it is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death, does not constitute murder as defined in cl. 4 of s. 300, but is mere culpable homicide not amounting to murder. In order that an act done with such knowledge should constitute murder, it is also necessary that it should be committed ‘without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death or such bodily injury.’ An act done with such knowledge alone is not prima facie an act of murder, subject to proof that there is some excuse. It becomes an act of murder, only, if it can be positively affirmed that there was no excuse. The requirements of this clause are not satisfied by the act of homicide being an act of extreme recklessness: it must be a wholly inexcusable act of extreme recklessness. It follows that when in view of all the circumstances found to exist in a particular case, it cannot be affirmed of an act falling in other respects within cl. 4 of s. 300, that it was committed without any excuse for incurring the risk mentioned, then such act, notwithstanding that it was done with the knowledge that it was so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death, is merely culpable homicide not amounting to murder under s. 299, cl. (3).

It is culpable homicide because the act causing death is done with the knowledge that the actor is thereby likely to cause death; it is not murder because it does not satisfy both parts of the definition of murder in cl. 4 of s. 300. Being culpable homicide and not being murder, the act is necessarily culpable homicide not amounting to murder.²⁴

This clause also appears to be designed to provide for that class of cases where the acts resulting in death are calculated to put the lives of many persons in jeopardy without being aimed at any one in particular, and are perpetrated with a full consciousness of the probable consequence. As, for example, where death is caused by firing a loaded gun into a crowd (vide ill. (d)), by poisoning a well from which people are accustomed to draw water, by opening the draw of a bridge just as a railway passenger train is about to pass over it. In such and the like cases, the imminently dangerous act, the extreme depravity of mind and the regardlessness of human life, properly place the crime upon the same level as the taking of life by deliberate intention.²⁵ Any person of average intelligence knows that the explosion of a bomb in a crowded room, however carefully it may be thrown, is an imminently dangerous act such as he must be deemed to know would in all probability cause death or at least such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. Accused, described by their counsel as persons of exceptional intelligence, must, therefore, be presumed to know that their act was dangerous and likely to cause death. The fact that accused had no deliberate intention of killing any particular individual does not take their case outside cl. (4) of this section when they had no excuse for running the risk.¹

'Imminently dangerous.'—Where it is clear that the act by which the death is caused is so imminently dangerous that the accused must be presumed to have known that it would, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, then unless he can meet this presumption, his offence will be culpable homicide, and it would be murder unless he can bring it under one of the exceptions.² Thus, a man who strikes at the back of another a violent blow with a formidable weapon must be taken to know that he is doing an act imminently dangerous to the life of the person at whom he strikes and that a probable result of his act will be to cause that person's death.³ Similarly, if a man strikes another in the throat with a knife he must have known that the blow is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death and the injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.⁴ But if the extent of knowledge required under this clause is wanting, the offence will be culpable homicide not amounting to murder. Thus, causing death by branding a thief without the knowledge requisite under this clause is held to be culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁵ Similarly, where a snake-charmer exhibited in public a venomous snake whose fangs he knew had not been extracted, and to show his own skill placed it on the head of a spectator who in trying to push it off was bitten and died, it was held that he was guilty under cl. (3) of s. 299.⁶ Where death was caused by a blow with a club and there was reason to think that the accused knew no more than that the blow was possibly dangerous to life, it was held that the conviction should be of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁷ But where the accused, four in number, all armed with heavy sticks, felled the deceased, who was defenceless and armless, gave him a prolonged beating and inflicted several blows completely smashing the skull, it was held that they were all guilty of murder under this clause although the evidence did not disclose which of the injuries were inflicted by each of the accused respectively.⁸ The accused during an altercation between him and the deceased deliberately went outside and fetched a yoke pin and returned after more than five minutes had elapsed and struck the deceased on the head with it with great force, causing injury resulting in the death of the deceased shortly afterwards. It was held that the accused must be taken to have known that his act was so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death, or such bodily injury as was likely to cause death and was guilty of murder.⁹

Where the accused under the influence of liquor assaulted the deceased and literally beat him to death with lathis without any direct motive, it was held that they were guilty of murder as they must have known that their act was "so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death".¹⁰ Where the injury inflicted by the accused person in a case of intoxication was of such a nature as any sober man must surely have known that the injury was likely to cause death, and where the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, it was held that although the act was intended to cause death the offence was one of murder.¹¹

'Without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death'.—These words mean without any excuse which a criminal Court administering the criminal law as embodied in this Code could reasonably regard as an excuse. The term 'excuse' also occurs in the explanation to s. 81, and it is there used as synonymous with the expression 'to justify which seems to indicate that the grammatical meaning of 'exculpating' or 'absolving' was intended to be retained. In this sense the words would mean in the absence of any exculpatory circumstances other than any of those circumstances mentioned in the five exceptions to this section.¹² It is well settled that it is not murder merely to cause death by doing an act with the knowledge that it is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death. In order that an act done with such knowledge should constitute murder it is necessary that it should be committed without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing the death or bodily injury. An act done with the knowledge of its consequence is not prima facie murder. It becomes murder only if it can be positively affirmed that there was no excuse. The requirements of the section are not satisfied by the act of homicide being one of extreme recklessness. It must in addition be wholly inexcusable when a risk is incurred—even a risk of the gravest possible character which must normally result in death—the taking of that risk is not murder unless it was inexcusable to take it.¹³ In this case a village woman of twenty was ill-treated by her husband. There was a quarrel between the two and the husband had threatened that he would beat her. At night time the woman, taking her six months' old baby in her arms, slipped away from the house. After she had gone some distance she heard somebody coming up behind her, and when she turned round and saw her husband was pursuing her, she got into a panic and jumped down a well nearby with the baby in her arms. The result was that the baby died and the woman recovered. She was charged with murder of the child. It was held that an intention to cause the death of the child could not be attributed to the accused, though she must be attributed with the knowledge—however primitive or frightened she might have been—that such an imminently dangerous act as jumping down the well was likely to cause the child's death; but the culpable homicide did not amount to murder because, considering the state of panic she was in, there was "excuse for incurring the risk of causing death" within the purview of this clause.¹⁴ Where a father sacrificed his son, because wealth had not accompanied his birth, and afterwards partially cut his own throat as a protest against the deity's injustice, he was held guilty of murder.¹⁵ A threat caused by incantations,¹⁶ or a belief in witchcraft,¹⁷ does not justify the causing of death.

Exceptions.—Unless the act done constitutes, at least, prima facie murder by reason of the intention with which it is found to be done, the Court need not consider the exceptions. Where a person causes the death of another person it is for him to show that his act was removed from the category of murder by one of the exceptions to the section.¹⁸

"The operation of the five exceptions to s. 300 is practically somewhat different in respect to an act which falls within one of the first three clauses of s. 300, and in respect to an act which falls within the 4th clause. These four clauses, it should be remarked, describe exhaustively all the classes of acts to which the five exceptions apply. The exceptions operate in this way. The existence of all the circumstances described in an exception excuses an act which would otherwise be murder within one of the first three clauses, to the extent that the act constitutes only culpable homicide not amounting to murder and not murder. Here the act is prima facie murder unless and until an exception is established. There is no inconsistency involved in finding that an act falls within one of these clauses and also falls within an exception, for all the circumstances of any exception may co-exist with the murderous intention. When however an act falls within the 4th clause of s. 300, as regards the knowledge with which it is done, and the circumstances constituting an exception exist, there is this difference, it cannot consistently be affirmed (at the end of a trial and upon all the evidence) of an act causing death done with the knowledge described, in one breath that it was done without any excuse for running the risk of causing death, and in the next breath that it was done under circumstances which the law declares to be an excuse for the act of causing death to the extent of preventing the culpable homicide amounting to murder... It is a matter of fact and not of law whether a particular act of homicide committed with the knowledge described in cl. 4 of s. 300 is committed without any excuse. As the 4th clause is framed, it need never be determined as a matter of law what circumstances, other than or falling short of the five exceptions, constitute an excuse, it being in each case a question of fact whether from the concomitant circumstances which are proved, the just inference is that the act was done 'without any excuse'. As this 4th clause is expressed like the three preceding clauses to be subject to the five exceptions which are legal excuses for murder (as contradistinguished from culpable homicide) it is evident that the words 'without any excuse' in clause 4 do not mean merely 'in the absence of the circumstances described in the exceptions'. A Jury or a Court as a Judge of fact is left at liberty to affirm upon proof of circumstances other than or falling short of an exception, not that these circumstances form an excuse for murder, but that in view of them the Jury or Court is unable to affirm that the particular act of homicide was committed without any excuse, and is therefore unable to pronounce the act to be culpable homicide amounting to murder, as defined in cl. (4) of s. 300".¹⁹

An offence may amount to culpable homicide but not murder even though none of the exceptions in this section are applicable to the case. Thus, where the accused strangles the deceased with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, but not with the intention of causing such bodily injury as he knew to be likely to cause death, or as is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, neither cl. (2) nor cl. (3) of this section applies, and the offence is culpable homicide not amounting to murder, even though none of the exceptions in this section apply to the case.²⁰

5. Exception 1.—'Grave and sudden provocation'.—Under this Exception the provocation (1) must be grave and sudden, and (2) must have by its gravity and suddenness deprived the accused of the power of self-control. In other words, it ought to be distinctly shown not only that the act was done under the influence of some feeling which took away from the person doing it all control over his action but that that feeling had an adequate cause. In the absence of such proof, the atrocity of the offence will not be mitigated and the offender will not be able to escape the legal consequences of his act.²¹ The test to see whether the accused acted under grave and sudden provocation is whether the provocation given was in the circumstances of the case likely to cause a normal reasonable man to lose control of himself to the extent of inflicting the injury or injuries that he did inflict.²² In Mancini v. Director of Public

*Prosecution*²³ Viscount Simon laid down—"It is not all provocation that will reduce the crime of murder to manslaughter. Provocation, to have that result, must be such as temporarily deprives the person provoked of the power of self-control, as the result of which he commits the unlawful act which causes death... The test to be applied is that of the effect of the provocation on a reasonable man, ... so that an unusually excitable or pugnacious individual is not entitled to rely on provocation which would not have led an ordinary person to act as he did. In applying the test, it is of particular importance (a) to consider whether a sufficient interval has elapsed since the provocation to allow a reasonable man time to cool, and (b) to take into account the instrument with which the homicide was effected, for to retort, in the heat of passion induced by provocation, by a simple blow, is a very different thing from making use of a deadly instrument like a concealed dagger. In short, the mode of resentment must bear a reasonable relationship to the provocation if the offence is to be reduced to manslaughter." In another case Lord Simon said: "The whole doctrine relating to provocation depends on the fact that it causes, or may cause, a sudden and temporary loss of self-control whereby malice, which is the formation of an intention to kill or to inflict grievous bodily harm, is negatived. Consequently, where the provocation inspires an actual intention to kill, or to inflict grievous bodily harm, the doctrine that provocation may reduce murder to manslaughter seldom applies. Only one very special exception has been recognised viz., the actual finding of a spouse, in the act of adultery."²⁴

Deceased was having an intrigue with the accused's wife for a long time and used to sing provocative songs tantamount to declaration of his intrigue with the wife of the accused and of a most provocative nature. The accused had managed to control himself on previous occasions when provoked by such songs, but on this occasion he lost self-control and shot the deceased. It was held that he was entitled to the benefit of this exception.²⁵

Anger is a passion to which good and bad men are both subject, and mere human frailty and infirmity ought not to be punished equally with ferocity or other evil feelings. The authors of the Code observe:—

"We agree with the great mass of mankind, and with the majority of jurists, ancient and modern, in thinking that homicide committed in the sudden heat of passion, on great provocation, ought to be punished; but that in general it ought not to be punished so severely as murder. It ought to be punished in order to teach men to entertain a peculiar respect for human life; it ought to be punished in order to give men a motive for accustoming themselves to govern their passions; and in some few cases for which we have made provision, we conceived that it ought to be punished with the utmost rigour.

"In general, however, we would not visit homicide committed in violent passion, which had been suddenly provoked, with the highest penalties of the law. We think that to treat a person guilty of such homicide as we should treat a murderer would be a highly inexpedient course,—a course which would shock the universal feeling of mankind, and would engage the public sympathy on the side of the delinquent against the law"¹

Provocation caused by words or gestures.—According to English law mere words, or gestures, not accompanied with anything of such a serious character as a blow will not, in point of law, be sufficient to reduce the crime to manslaughter.² A sudden confession of adultery by either spouse without more can never constitute provocation of a sort which might reduce murder to manslaughter.³ Mere suspicion of a wife's adultery is not sufficient to reduce a husband's homicide of the suspected person to manslaughter.⁴ A statement by the wife that she was going to live with another man or was about to commit adultery, does not amount to provocation so as to reduce the crime of killing from murder to manslaughter.⁵ But the law as to provocation sufficient to reduce homicide to manslaughter is not the same in the case of unmarried as of married persons. "It is a grave offence against the husband for the wife to commit adultery, but there is no such offence when a man is living with another woman. He has no right to object to her going to a house of ill-fame; the case is entirely different".⁶

The authors of the Code remark: "We greatly doubt whether any good reason can be assigned for this distinction. It is an indisputable fact, that gross insults by word or gesture have as great a tendency to move many persons to violent passion as dangerous or painful bodily injuries; nor does it appear to us that passion excited by insult is entitled to less indulgence than passion excited by pain. On the contrary the circumstance that a man resents an insult more than a wound is anything but a proof that he is a man of peculiarly bad heart. It would be a fortunate thing for mankind if every person felt an outrage which left a stain upon his honour more acutely than an outrage which fractured one of his limbs. If so, why should we treat an offence produced by the blamable excess of a feeling which all wise legislators desire to encourage, more severely than we treat the blamable excess of feelings certainly not more respectable?..."

"A person who should offer a gross insult to the Mahomedan religion in the presence of a zealous professor of that religion; who should deprive some high-born Rajpoot of his caste; who should rudely thrust his head into the covered palanquin of a woman of rank, would probably move those whom he insulted to more violent anger than if he had caused them some severe bodily hurt".⁷

The Law Commissioners in their First Report⁸ say: "The discretion...is purposely left to the Court to judge whether the provocation be such as would be likely to move a person of ordinary temper to violent passion, not any person it is to be understood, but a person of the same habits, manners, and feelings. A discreet Judge... would properly reject the plea of provocation by insulting words in one case, while he would as properly admit it in another, according as the party might be shewn to belong to a class sensitive to insult of this kind, or otherwise. The framers of the Code deemed it inadvisable to lay it down as a rule that insults by words or gestures should be considered an adequate cause of provocation, while, for the reason assigned, they thought it proper to allow the plea of provocation, where it may be evident that such insults have as great a tendency as bodily injuries to excite violent passion."

Abusive words.—Use of merely abusive or vulgar language is not a grave provocation.⁹

Where the accused struck the deceased a hasty though fatal blow with a stick for abusing his mother;¹⁰ where the accused killed the deceased for grossly abusing him in filthy language;¹¹ where the accused quarrelled with his wife who was dilatory in the performance of her household duties and exchanged abuse with her, and gave her a blow on the side of the head with a heavy hammer which he picked up on the spur of the moment, from the effects of which she died,¹² and where the accused, a weak-looking youth of about seventeen years of age (his wife being about thirty-five), on his unexpected return to his house, found the paramour of his wife coming out of his house and on remonstrating with his wife was further annoyed by her reception of his remonstrances and killed her with a hoe,¹³ it was held that the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder was committed. Where the accused, a lad of nineteen years, was abused by the deceased and he killed him in anger, it was held that the provocation could not be said to be grave and sudden such as would reduce the offence of murder to that of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁴

'Whilst deprived of the power of self-control.'—The test to be applied in order to determine whether homicide which would otherwise be murder is manslaughter by reason of provocation, is whether the provocation was sufficient to deprive a reasonable man of his self-control, not whether it was sufficient to deprive the particular person charged with murder (e.g. a person afflicted with defective control and want of mental balance) of his self-control.¹⁵ The provocation must be such as will upset, not merely a hot-tempered or hyper-sensitive person, but one of ordinary sense and calmness.¹⁶ The act must be done whilst the person doing it is deprived of self-control by grave and sudden provocation. That is, it must be done under the immediate impulse of provocation.¹⁷ The deprivation of the power of self-control must continue in order to benefit a man who kills another under circumstances of grave provocation.¹⁸ The fatal blow should be clearly traced to the passion arising from that provocation. Therefore, if, from the circumstances, it appears that the party, before any provocation given, intended to use a deadly weapon towards anyone who might assault him, this would show that a fatal blow given afterwards was not to be attributed to the provocation, and the crime would therefore be murder.¹⁹ Again, if the act was done after the first excitement had passed away, and there was time to cool, it is murder.²⁰

As to the question how long the law will allow for the blood continuing heated under the circumstances, and what shall be considered as evidence of its having cooled, it is laid down in East,²¹ that "In every case of homicide, how great soever the provocation may have been, if there be a sufficient time for the passion to subside and for reason to interpose, such homicide will be murder... With respect to what interval of time shall be allowed for passion to subside... the immediate object of inquiry is, whether the suspension of reason arising from sudden passion continued from the time of the provocation received to the very instant of the mortal stroke given: for if from any circumstances whatever it appear that the party reflected, deliberated, or cooled, any time before the fatal stroke given; or if in legal presumption there was time or opportunity for cooling; the killing will amount to murder; as being attributable to malice and revenge rather than to human frailty... such malice will be presumed, even though the act be perpetrated recently after the provocation received, if the instrument or manner of retaliation be greatly inadequate to the offence given, and cruel and dangerous in its nature... [The killing will amount to murder] if between the provocation received and the stroke given [the party giving the stroke] fall into other discourse, or diversions, and continue so engaged a reasonable time for cooling; or if he take up and pursue any other business or design, not connected with the immediate object of his passion, nor subservient thereto, so that it may be reasonably supposed that his intention was once called off from the subject of the provocation. Again, if it appear that he meditated upon his revenge, or used any trick or circumvention to effect it; for that shews deliberation, which is inconsistent with the excuse of sudden passion, and is the strongest evidence of malice. It may be further observed in respect to time, that in proportion to the lapse thereof [time] between the provocation and the stroke, less allowance ought to be made for any excess of retaliation, either in the instrument, or the manner of it... The mere length of time intervening between the injury and the retaliation... is... evidence in itself of deliberation."

The question to be determined in every case will be: "Was there time for the blood to cool and for reason to resume its seat?"²² If there was, the offence will be murder; if there was not, the offence will be culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

'Grave and sudden provocation.'—The provocation must be grave and sudden and of such a nature as to deprive the accused of the power of self-control. In determining whether the provocation was so, it is admissible to take into account the condition of the mind in which the offender was at the time of the provocation.²³ But it is not a necessary consequence of anger, or other emotion, that the power of self-control should be lost.²⁴ It must be shown distinctly not only that the act was done under the influence of some feeling which took away from the person doing it all control over his actions, but that that feeling had an adequate cause.²⁵ It has, therefore, been held in a series of cases that the commission of adultery by a wife within the sight of her husband is a sufficient grave provocation to bring the husband within this exception if he kills her. In such cases very mild punishment is usually inflicted.

Information received from a reliable person and believed to be credible as to the existence of a provoking act, which is being done in the immediate neighbourhood and the existence of which is instantaneously verified, can be said to be provocation given by the person committing that act just as much as if the person provoked had seen it in the first place with his own eyes.¹

"It must not however be understood that any trivial provocation, which in point of law amounts to an assault, or even a blow, will of course reduce the crime of the party killing to manslaughter... For where the punishment inflicted for a slight transgression of any sort is outrageous in its nature either in the manner or the continuance of it, and beyond all proportion to the offence, it is rather to be considered as the effect of a brutal and diabolical malignity than of human frailty: it is one of the true symptoms of what the law denominates malice; and therefore the crime will amount to murder, notwithstanding such provocation."²

When the derangement of the mind reaches that degree that the judgment and reason ceases to hold dominion over it—their authority being suspended and yielding place to violent and ungovernable passion—the man who was before a rational being is no longer the master of his own understanding, becomes incapable of cool reflection, and ceases to have control over his passions. It is to such a state of mind that the law in judging of acts which cause death, gives indulgent considerations. And no mental perturbation or agitation which falls short of this, and leaves sway to reason and the power of self-control, can reduce a murder to an offence within the range of this mitigating exception.³

The provocation must be such as will upset not merely a hasty and hot-tempered or hypersensitive person, but one of ordinary sense and calmness.⁴ The mere sight of a person going to Court who had filed a criminal complaint should not give rise to grave and sudden provocation in the mind of the accused and if he kills the complainant after some altercation the offence will be murder.⁵

'Sudden.'—Grave provocation, arising from injuries extending over a long series of years, has been held to be insufficient, in the absence of evidence of recent and sudden provocation, to reduce the offence to culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The accused killed the deceased because, according to his allegations, the deceased had seduced his cousin, had encroached on his ancestral tope and had cut down trees, had persuaded the woman, whose land he cultivated, to turn him away, had usurped his share in the village, and had struck him and constantly behaved towards him in an insolent manner, it was held that there was nothing in the circumstances mentioned by him which could be taken as provocation so grave and sudden as to reduce the offence to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁶ Where the accused's concubine refused to abandon another connection and the accused, after remonstrating with the woman and leaving her, followed and killed her with a dagger which he stated he had purchased with the intention of killing her, it was held that though the provocation may have been grave, it was not of so sudden a character as to reduce the offence to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁷ Where the accused found seated on the same cot with his wife her paramour whom he had expelled from his house only a day previously, and he gave a blow with an adze which fractured the skull of his wife and killed her, it was held that the accused must be considered to have received a grave and sudden provocation.⁸ The refusal of a wife to have connection with her husband is held not to constitute a grave and sudden provocation.⁹

The deceased abused a woman of the house of the accused when the accused was not there. The accused on being informed of it proceeded to the house of the deceased and challenged him to fight for having abused the woman. The deceased came out of the house to meet the accused when some persons intervened and pushed the accused to his house. The deceased again came out of his house and challenged the accused to fight and abused him. The accused accepted the challenge. The deceased caught hold of the accused by the tuft of his hair and gave him blows with his fist. The accused then gave a fatal blow with a dagger. It was held that though the original provocation by the deceased was not grave and sudden, it was aggressive, and the second provocation, viz., seizing by the tuft, was grave and sudden and the accused came within this exception.¹⁰

A provocation however grave which is not sudden but is a chronic one will not satisfy the requirements of the exception.¹¹ An attack on the head of a religious community may be a provocation, but it cannot be said to be sudden where he had knowledge of it a couple of days ago.¹²

'Causes the death of the person who gave the provocation.'—The first exception only applies when the death of the person giving provocation has been caused. Cases like those which are not unfrequent of a person under excitement running amok and killing all whom he meets, are not mitigated by this exception.

'Mistake.'—See s. 76, supra. This exception treats the case of a person killed by mistake or accident as culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

'Accident.'—See ills. (a) and (b) and s. 80, supra.

6. Proviso 1.—'Provocation is not sought or voluntarily provoked.'—Where the provocation is sought by the accused, it cannot furnish any defence against the charge of murder. A and B were at some difference. A bade B take a pin out of the sleeve of A, intending thereby to take an occasion to strike or wound B, and B did so accordingly, and then A struck B whereof he died. This was held to be murder because there was no provocation, since the act was done with the consent of A, and because it appeared to be a malicious and deliberate artifice to take occasion to kill B.¹³ Where A and B having fallen out, A said he would not strike but would give B a pot of ale to strike him, whereupon B struck and A killed him, it was held that A had committed murder as the provocation given was courted by him.¹⁴

This proviso includes the case of premeditated murder in which part of the plan of the murderer is to incite the victim to provoke him, so that he may prepare the way for his own defence if he should be prosecuted.¹⁵ If the accused goes deliberately in search of the provocation sought to be made the mitigation of his offence, the first exception will not apply.¹⁶

As to the definition of the word 'voluntarily', see s. 39, supra.

7. Proviso 2.—The wording of this proviso does not limit its provisions to public servants only, but includes all persons acting according to the commands of law.¹⁷ The Law Commissioners in their First Report¹⁸ say: "We apprehend that grave provocation given by any thing done under cover of obedience to the law, or under cover of its authority, or by a public servant, or in defence, in excess of what it strictly warranted by the law, in point of violence, or as regards the means used, or the manner of using them, and the like, would be admissible in extenuation of homicide under this clause." As to 'public servant', see s. 21, supra.

8. Proviso 3.—A person lawfully exercising the right of private defence may give provocation to the aggressor, but the aggressor is thereby not entitled to take shelter under the first exception. "For example, take the case of Wat Tyler...He was a public officer, a tax gatherer, who came to 'exercise his lawful powers' in that capacity, but doing so in a manner unwarranted and highly offensive, Tyler was excited to violent passion, and in his rage killed him on the spot. The Commissioners upon this say, 'so far, indeed, should we be from ranking a man who acted like Tyler with murderers, that we conceive that a Judge would exercise a sound discretion in sentencing such a man to the lowest punishment fixed by the law for manslaughter' ".¹⁹ See ill. (e) to Exception 1. As to the right of private defence, see ss. 96-106, supra.

9. Explanation.—The Calcutta High Court has laid down that provocation is a question of fact, and where the Judge and assessors have found on the evidence that the accused is not guilty of murder, the High Court cannot interfere, as no question of law is involved.²⁰ But in a similar case the Allahabad High Court has treated this question as one of law.²¹ The Allahabad view is not in accordance with the present state of law in England and is contrary to the principle of this Explanation.

Cases.—Provocation caused by adulterous intercourse.—Where woman is wife.—Where the accused found a man committing adultery with his wife and killed him;²² where the accused under similar circumstances killed both his own wife and the adulterer;²³ where the accused killed a person who had come to his house with the intention of having sexual intercourse with his wife²⁴ and thereafter killed his wife also;²⁵ where the accused saw another man in the act of sleeping with his wife with the intention of committing adultery;¹ where the accused saw a man in criminal conversation with his wife on the first day, and on the second, seeing them eating together, he took up a bill-hook which was lying near and killed him;² where the accused, finding that his wife was forcibly taken to the house of a native physician, who alleged that her presence was necessary for the performance of some incantations, took a sword and watched the proceedings from the roof of a house, and on seeing his wife being violated by the physician, jumped down from the roof, and killed him with the sword;³ where the accused saw his wife in company with her paramour and killed her;⁴ where the accused seeing a man going out of a place at night time where his wife was, pursued him but he escaped and on asking his wife she abused him and he killed her,⁵ it was held that the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder was committed. Accused's wife led a grossly immoral life. After a recent act of unchastity the accused remonstrated with her and instead of showing repentance she replied that she would continue in the course to which he objected. The accused became enraged and struck her with a stick. She struggled with him and got hold of his fingers and bit them. Accused then lost control of himself, took out a knife and stabbed her repeatedly with it with the result that she died from the injuries. It was held that the immediate provocation offered to the accused at the time of his remonstrance coming on the top of all that had gone before was sufficient to reduce the offence of the accused from murder to one of culpable homicide.⁶ The accused and his wife's sister's husband B were sleeping on the same cot in a verandah, and the accused's wife was sleeping in the adjoining room. Some time in the night B got up and went into the room and bolted the door behind him. The accused also got up and peeping through a chink in the door saw B and the accused's wife having sexual intercourse. The accused returned and lay down on the cot. After some time B came out of the room and lay down on the cot by the side of the accused. After a short time, when B began dozing, the accused stabbed him several times with a knife and killed him. There was no evidence that the accused had to go anywhere to search for the knife, which, apparently, was with him. It was held that the case came within this exception notwithstanding the interval of time between the seeing of the act of adultery and the killing of B, and the accused having acted under grave and sudden provocation the offence committed was one under s. 304 and not under s. 302.⁷

Where woman is not wife.—The Calcutta and the Patna High Courts have held that where the relationship between the parties is not that of husband and wife the offence would be murder.⁸ But the Madras High Court has taken a contrary view. It has held that the question of provocation is a purely psychological question and one cannot apply considerations of social morality to such a purely psychological question. Consequently where a man sees a woman in the arms of another, and loses control over himself, the circumstance that she was his mistress and not wife does not make any real difference for the purpose of s. 304.⁹ The High Courts of Allahabad, Bombay and Lahore have held likewise. Where the accused found his sister having illicit connection with a man and in a fit of passion killed them both on the spot, it was held that the plea of grave and sudden provocation reduced the offence to one of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁰ The deceased who was the younger sister of the accused had left her husband and was living under his care. She was suspected to be of an immoral character. On the night of her murder at about 3 a.m. she had gone out to meet a stranger in the compound at the back of the house for a clandestine purpose. When the accused asked the deceased why she did not give up evil ways she refused to listen to him and gave an insolent reply. It was held that the provocation received by the accused was in the circumstances almost as "grave and sudden" as it would have been had the accused seen the deceased in the act of sexual intercourse with a stranger and the provocation was further aggravated by the insolent reply given by the deceased and he was guilty under the first clause of s. 304.¹¹ Where the accused saw his sister and her paramour coming from the precincts of a mosque, and, receiving an insulting answer from the latter, there and then killed him;¹² and where the accused on seeing a person misbehaving with his brother's wife ran after him and killed him,¹³ it was held that the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder was committed.

Confession by woman of immoral conduct.—Although a confession of adultery by a wife to her husband who, in consequence, kills her, may be such provocation as will entitle the jury in their discretion to find a verdict of manslaughter instead of murder, a similar confession of illicit intercourse by a woman who was not the accused's wife but only engaged to be married to him, cannot, if he kills her in consequence, justify such a verdict.¹⁴

The principle that, if a wife suddenly confessed to her husband that she has committed adultery, it may be treated as equivalent to the discovery of the act itself and if the husband forthwith kills her, the offence is only one of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, cannot be extended to a case of murder by the husband of the paramour with whom his wife has confessed to have committed adultery. The accused strongly suspected that his wife had gone wrong with the deceased. Acting with considerable deliberation the accused sent for the deceased and when he arrived he asked his wife as to whether she was amusing herself with the deceased and she confessed her misconduct with the deceased. Then he asked him if it were true, and without waiting for a reply, drew a knife from his waist and stabbed him in his chest which proved fatal. It was held that the accused was guilty of murder and not culpable homicide not amounting to murder, that it was not a matter of any sudden confession on the wife's part that surprised him and took him off his balance, but only a confirmation of that which he had already suspected, if he had not really believed it.¹⁵

The accused, a soldier, returned home on leave and found his home and children in a very neglected condition. His wife admitted that she had been unfaithful to him. Their infant son, aged two years, was suffering from a painful malady. On the day of the crime the wife left the house, and, although repeatedly sent for, refused to return to the child, who was visibly in intense pain. The accused, provoked by the continued neglect of his wife, killed the child. It was held that the provocation owing to the neglect of the wife, which was set up as a defence, was insufficient to reduce the crime to manslaughter.¹⁶

Provocation caused by adultery, but death caused not in a fit of passion.—Where the accused finding a man intriguing with his wife, beat him, and after taking him to the bank of a river, cut off his head;¹⁷ where the accused finding the deceased lying with his wife, took him to another house, where his father brought a bamboo with which the accused and his father suffocated the deceased by placing the bamboo on his neck;¹⁸ where the accused's concubine refused to abandon another connection and the accused after remonstrating with the woman and leaving her, followed and killed her with a dagger which he had purchased with the intention of killing her;¹⁹ where the accused suspecting infidelity in his wife followed her with a hatchet one night, when she stealthily left his house, and finding her talking with her paramour, there and then killed her;²⁰ where the accused, suspecting the widow of his cousin, followed her one night with a sword in hand to a considerable distance, and finding her actually having connection with her lover, killed her there and then;²¹ and where the accused suspected his sister of unchastity and killed her and the man with whom she had come to his house after some conversation,²² it was held that the offence of murder was committed. It was held similarly where the accused suspected his wife and made preparations to catch her with her paramour. A person whom he had asked to be on the watch called him outside his house and pointed out the spot where she and her paramour were together. Thereupon the accused returned to his house, took a heavy wooden pole and going to the place caught the couple in the act, and dealt the paramour a blow on the head which killed him on the spot.²³ The mere singing by the deceased girl of love songs, which reminded the accused (her cousin) of her immoral relations with a stranger, was held not to constitute such grave provocation as would reduce the offence of murder to one of homicide not amounting to murder.²⁴ No doubt in all these cases there was provocation, but the acts were not committed while the accused were deprived of the power of self-control, they were not the offspring of the moment, but they were the result of cool and mature consideration after the first excitement had passed away.

Where the accused stated that he had seen the deceased arrange a clandestine meeting between his wife and a young man, whom he actually saw enter his wife's room some time before midnight and again leave it after a considerable interval, and that in consequence of what he saw he had not a wink of sleep that night and was devoid of his senses at the time he killed the deceased, it was held that there was no doubt the accused did actually believe he had ocular proof of his wife's infidelity, and that if he had acted under the immediate influence of such a delusion, the estimate of his guilt must be made upon the basis of the actual existence of the fact in regard to which the delusion existed, and had the accused acted under the immediate influence of such provocation his guilt would have been greatly reduced, but as he did not do so, his offence was murder.²⁵

The mother of the accused had been behaving in a shameless manner in running away with her paramour (the deceased) on several occasions. On the last occasion she took her young daughter aged sixteen or seventeen years with her. The accused suspected the deceased and killed him. It was held that the provocation to the accused was not "grave and sudden."¹ The accused knew that his sister had gone to see the deceased with whom she had illicit connection and deliberately went there to kill the deceased if he found him with his sister. It was held that the provocation was no doubt grave but not sudden. The accused expected to find at the spot before he left his house what he afterwards found there. There was, therefore, no suddenness about the discovery of his sister in the company of the deceased and the accused could not be said to have been deprived of the power of self-control. On the other hand, he sought the provocation by deliberately going to the scene of the meeting.² Where the deceased fell in love with the same woman the accused was in love with and he was not prepared to give up his illicit connection with that woman at the bidding of the accused and the accused killed him, it was held that it could hardly be said that his conduct gave grave provocation to the accused, and would not mitigate his crime of brutal murder committed after premeditation.³

Where the accused were lying in wait armed with spears, expecting the deceased to come that side to prosecute his intrigue with the girl who was betrothed to one of them, and intended to murder him, if he did come, it was held that it could not be said that the provocation was sudden in that it deprived the accused of their power of self-control and thus impelled them to commit the offence and that they were guilty under s. 302.⁴ Where the wife of the accused was living with the deceased for sometime and the accused sought out the deceased and stabbed him, it was held that the accused was guilty of murder.⁵

In England it is held that mere suspicion of adultery by a wife is not enough to reduce killing by the husband from murder to manslaughter.⁶

Grave provocation.—Where death was caused by an act presumably committed partly under the influence of apprehension from a severe beating from which the accused had just escaped and partly under the influence of provocation caused by the beating, it was held that the conviction should have been of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁷ Where a husband and wife were not on good terms and on one occasion when the husband asked for pan (betel) the wife threw dirty rice-water in his face and the husband being enraged took up a stone and struck her on the head and the wife died, it was held that the act of the wife was grave and sudden provocation and the husband was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁸ The accused found three youths stealing pineapples from his garden. He chased them and overtaking one of them cut him down with a da. It was night and dark, there was nothing to show that the deceased attempted to cause hurt to the accused. It was held that the law should be construed liberally in favour of the accused in such a case if he has acted in good faith for the protection of his person and property, though he had acted in excess of his legal rights; and that he was entitled to the benefit of s. 300, Excep. 1, having acted under the excitement of grave and sudden provocation.⁹

No grave provocation.—A belief in having been the victim of witchcraft during a period extending over three or four months was held not to constitute provocation sufficient in its nature and suddenness to reduce the offence to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁰ Where the accused stabbed his wife with a penknife in the region of her breast and caused a wound two and a half inches deep because she refused to go with him to another place immediately but merely asked him to wait for a night, it was held that there was no provocation of a grave and sudden character and that the accused must have intended to cause her death.¹¹ A, B and C had been drinking together and were all more or less intoxicated. A pressed C to drink more and on his refusing A got angry and drew a clasp knife on C. B, the deceased, interfered and, after vainly remonstrating with A, hit him with a branch of a tree on the head. Getting incensed at this A inflicted on B a fatal blow. It was held that as the deceased hit the accused with the sole object of preventing him from stabbing C in the exercise of the right of private defence as laid down in s. 97, this provocation would not bring the accused's act under the first Exception to this section.¹² Throwing of a clod of earth by a child of three or four was held not to be sufficient provocation for a man causing its death by swinging it round his head and dashing it against the ground.¹³ Where the accused left his wife for eight months exposed to temptation during which period she misbehaved and became pregnant and on returning home he killed her lover when he was asleep, it was held that the accused was not entitled to a lenient treatment and must receive a capital sentence, inasmuch as the murder could not be said to have been committed on grave and sudden provocation.¹⁴ The accused asked his wife to sever her connection with her paramour but she declined to do so. Thereupon there was a quarrel between the accused and his wife in the course of which he lost his temper and in a fit of anger killed his wife. It was held that there was no grave and sudden provocation within the meaning of this Exception, but there was provocation entitling him to the lesser penalty of transportation for life.¹⁵

10. Exception 2.—Exceeding the right of private defence.—This Exception provides for the case of a person who exceeds the right of private defence. The authors of the Code say: "Wherever the limits of the right of private defence may be placed, and with whatever degree of accuracy they may be marked, we are inclined to think that it will always be expedient to make a separation between murder and what we have designated as voluntary culpable homicide in defence.

"The chief reason for making this separation is that the law itself invites men to the very verge of the crime which we have designated as voluntary culpable homicide in defence. It prohibits such homicide indeed; but it authorizes acts which lie very near to such homicide; and this circumstance, we think, greatly mitigates the guilt of such homicide.

"That a man who deliberately kills another in order to prevent that other from pulling his nose should be allowed to go absolutely unpunished, would be most dangerous. The law punishes and ought to punish such killing; but we cannot think that the law ought to punish such killing as murder; for the law itself has encouraged the slayer to inflict on the assailant any harm short of death which may be necessary for the purpose of repelling the outrage; to give the assailant a cut with a knife across the fingers which may render his right hand useless to him for life, or to hurl him downstairs with such force as to break his leg; and it seems difficult to conceive that circumstances which would be a full justification of any violence short of homicide should not be a mitigation of the guilt of homicide. That a man should be merely exercising a right by fracturing the skull and knocking out the eye of an assailant, and should be guilty of the highest crime in the Code if he kills the same assailant; that there should be only a single step between perfect innocence and murder, between perfect impunity and liability to capital punishment, seems unreasonable. In a case in which the law itself empowers an individual to inflict any harm short of death, it ought hardly, we think, to visit him with the highest punishment if he inflicts death.

"It is to be considered also that the line between those aggressions which it is lawful to repel by killing, and those which it is not lawful so to repel, is in our Code, and must be in every Code, to a great extent an arbitrary line, and that many individual cases will fall on one side of that line which, if we had framed the law with a view to those cases alone, we should place on the other. Thus we allow a man to kill if he has no other means of preventing an incendiary from burning a house; and we do not allow him to kill for the purpose of preventing the commission of a simple theft. But a house may be a wretched heap of mats and thatch, propped by a few bamboos, and not worth altogether twenty rupees. A simple theft may deprive a man of a pocket-book, which contains bills to a great amount, the savings of a long and laborious life, the sole dependence of a large family. That in these cases the man who kills the incendiary should be pronounced guiltless of any offence, and that the man who kills the thief should be sentenced to the gallows, or, if he is treated with the utmost lenity which the Courts can show, to perpetual transportation or imprisonment, would be generally condemned as a shocking injustice. We are, therefore, clearly of opinion that the offence which we have designated as voluntary culpable homicide in defence ought to be distinguished from murder in such a manner that the Courts may have it in their power to inflict a slight or merely nominal punishment on acts which, though not within the letter of the law which authorizes killing in self-defence, are yet within the reason of that law."¹⁶

For the application of this exception it is essential that the person causing hurt in the bona fide exercise of the right of private defence should act without any intention of doing more harm than is necessary for the purpose of such defence.¹⁷

The onus of proving private defence is on the accused.¹⁸ Where the accused sets up a plea of self-defence, the question to consider is whether the accused had any reasonable apprehension that he would be hurt; and particularly in a case where he has caused death whether he was under any reasonable apprehension of grievous hurt or death to himself. It is his apprehension that is the important point and not the injuries suffered by him.¹⁹ An accused who is aggressor cannot claim the right of private defence against the rescuer of his victim.²⁰ Where peaceful citizens were attacked by a body of men armed with deadly weapons, it was held that it could not be said that the right of private defence was exceeded if those attacked, in their turn, used similar weapons; nor could it be said if in using those weapons one of the aggressors was killed, that that would necessarily be exceeding the right of private defence.²¹

Where the party opposing the accused actually started the fight but was overwhelmed by the party of the accused by reason of their superior number, it was held that the accused were guilty of culpable homicide and not of murder, notwithstanding the fact that the accused were prepared for a fight and the disparity in the numbers of the two opposing parties was such that their act was more like a massacre than a fight.²² Where the accused reasonably apprehends injury or insult to his person or trespass to his property, and is overawed by the strength of the other party and loses all control of himself and causes death he must be deemed to have acted in self-defence though in excess of it.²³

If a person in exercising the right of defending the body of another person against any offence affecting his body, in fact does no more than exercise such right he commits no offence; but if he exceeds that right and kills the offender when in fact it was unnecessary to kill, then under the second Exception to this section it is still a lesser offence than murder if the intention of the accused was to do no more harm than he believed necessary in the exercise of his right. Even though there was a reckless criminality in the act the case would fall within the Exception if the right of private defence was the only impulse operating in the mind of the accused, and he did not kill with a vengeful motive in the purported exercise of his right.²⁴

Cases.—No right of private defence.—Where a person wilfully killed another whilst endeavouring to escape, after having been detected in the act of housebreaking by night for the purpose of theft,²⁵ where a person pursued a thief and killed him after a house-trespass had ceased,¹ and where after an altercation between the accused and the deceased, who was armed with a hatchet, the accused first wrested the hatchet from his hands and then stabbed him to death,² it was held that they had committed murder and they did not come under this Exception. A head constable, in order to extort money from certain gipsies unlawfully ordered one of them to be bound and taken away. There was a great disturbance caused thereby and the gipsies advanced in a threatening manner towards the constable, upon which he fired a gun at the crowd and killed one of them. Any apprehension that death or grievous hurt would be the consequence of the acts of such crowd would have ceased, had he released the gipsy he had unlawfully arrested and withdrawn himself, or had he effected his escape. It was held that the head constable had no right of private defence against the acts of the gipsies and that he was guilty of murder.³ Where the accused finding a feeble old woman stealing his crop, beat her so violently that she died from the effect of the attack, it was held that he was guilty of murder.⁴ Similarly, where the accused went on a moonlight night armed with heavy clubs and assaulted two persons who were cutting their rice crop, one of whom received six distinct fractures of the bones of the skull besides a number of other wounds and was killed on the spot, it was held that they were guilty of murder.⁵ The accused who was watching his field (some of the grain of which had on previous occasions been stolen) saw the deceased cutting his corn. On being pursued (the night being dark) the deceased ran his head against a tree and fell. The accused then hit him recklessly with a stick (which was not proved to be a very formidable weapon) while on the ground, and fractured his skull in two places, causing death. It was held that he was guilty of culpable homicide.⁶ Where the accused was the aggressor and the deceased attacked him with a knife and the accused stabbed him in self-defence, it was held that the accused was not entitled to claim the right of self-defence but was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁷

Threats of incantations give no right of defence.—The accused and the deceased met one day at a liquor shop, and there drank together. They afterwards walked in company, and on their way an altercation took place in respect of the deceased having caused the death of the accused's four children by incantations. The deceased admitted that he had so caused their death, and added that he would also bring about the death of the accused by causing the accused to be taken by a tiger. The accused, thereupon, killed the deceased with several blows of a heavy club. It was held that the accused had no reasonable apprehension of danger to himself from the threats of the deceased and that his case was not taken out of the category of murder by reason of this Exception.⁸

Right of private defence exceeded.—Where a thief was seen with half his body and head through the wall of a house occupied by women except the accused and his young idiot son, and the accused suddenly caught up a sort of pole-axe, and with it struck the thief five times on his neck and nearly cut off his head, it was held that the accused inflicted more hurt than was necessary for defence and was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁹ The accused was appointed a watchman to watch certain crops. He saw a person coming there and beginning to steal them. He remonstrated with the thief and the two quarrelled and proceeded to fight. The accused being stronger of the two got him down and strangled him with his hands and then went off to the landholder and informed him that he had a fight with the thief and that he was dead or about to die. It was held that the accused was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁰ A cry of thief being unjustly raised against the accused, he turned and shot dead one of his pursuers. The accused was held to have committed culpable homicide and not murder.¹¹ The accused, who was appointed to protect the crops in a field, went round one night and saw in the darkness a man cutting the crop. The thief on seeing the accused arose. Upon this the accused, who was armed with a club, at once struck him a blow on the head felling him to the ground, with the result that he died that very night. It was held that the accused had exceeded the right of private defence of property, and that he was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹² Where the deceased who was of a stronger physique than the accused picked up a clod of earth to strike the accused who under the circumstances struck the deceased with hatchet blows it was held that the accused had a reasonable apprehension of hurt being caused to him but he must be taken to have exceeded his right of private defence.¹³ Where the deceased was either causing mischief or committing trespass on the property of the accused and in the act the accused struck the deceased a blow which caused his death, it was held that the accused had the right to defend his property, had the injury caused to the deceased amounted only to grievous hurt, but as he had given the blow with a rafter with such violence as to fracture the skull he was guilty of murder.¹⁴ Where a creditor's peons armed with lathis and kirpans seized the accused, the debtor, and began dragging him from his house and the accused struck them suddenly with a knife as a result of which one of the peons died, it was held that he was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, he having exceeded the right of private defence.¹⁵ The accused seeing his brother struck on the head by the deceased with a bamboo and felled to the ground, stabbed the deceased which resulted in his death. It was held that the accused was so provoked as to be deprived of the power of self-control and there was no reason to suppose that the accused was actuated by any impulse but that of exercising the right of private defence of the body and that as he had exceeded the right he was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁶

Where the accused had been carrying on a liaison with the wife of the deceased and the deceased came into the court-yard in a state of great excitement brandishing a lathi obviously determined to use violence against his erring wife upon which the accused snatched the lathi from the deceased and struck him twice on his head which caused his death, it was held that this Exception was applicable and the accused was guilty under the first part of s. 304.¹⁷ Where of two persons A and B, A was armed with a dang (club) and B with a knife, A tried to strike B and missed the stroke and the two then grappled with each other, in the course of which A was unarmed but threw down B who then struck A with his knife and A collapsed and died under the shock, it was held that B exceeded the right of private defence which he had and that he was guilty under the first part of s. 304.¹⁸

11. Exception 3.—Public servant or person aiding him exceeding the powers given by law.—This Exception protects a public servant, or a person aiding a public servant acting for the advancement of public justice, if either of them exceed the powers given to them by law and cause death. It gives protection so long as the public servant acts in good faith; but if his act is illegal and unauthorized by law, or if he glaringly exceed the powers given to him by law, the Exception will not protect him.

As to 'good faith', see s. 52, supra; and as to 'public servant,' see s. 21, supra.

Cases.—Public servant exceeding power given by law.—Where the accused, fearful of being punished if they allowed an outlaw to escape, and thinking that they were acting lawfully, in furtherance of a plan arranged for them by a police constable, and the lumberdar of a village, for the capture of the outlaw, for whose arrest a reward had been offered, and, in pursuance thereof, killed him while he was endeavouring to escape, it was held that the offence committed came under this Exception and amounted to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁹

Public servant doing unlawful act.—Where death was caused by a constable under the orders of a superior officer, it being found that neither he nor his superior officer believed that it was necessary for the public security to disperse certain reapers by firing on them, it was held that he was guilty of murder, since he was “not protected in that he obeyed the orders of his superior officer.”²⁰

12. Exception 4.—Death caused without premeditation in a sudden fight in the heat of passion without taking undue advantage or acting in a cruel manner.—The Exception directs the attention to the distinction between the present and some of the preceding Exceptions. In many cases of mutual contest, homicide caused by the person who received the first blow or the provocation, would, under those Exceptions, have been extenuated. But if that person's death had been caused by his opponent, the offence would not have been within the reach of any mitigating provision. The present Exception is meant to apply to cases in which, notwithstanding that a blow may have been struck or some provocation given in the origin of the dispute,—or in whatsoever way the quarrel may have originated,—yet the subsequent conduct of both parties puts them, in respect of guilt, upon an equal footing. For, there is a mutual combat, and blows on each side. And however slight the first blow, or provocation, every fresh blow becomes a fresh provocation. The blood already heated warms at every subsequent stroke, and the voice of reason is heard on neither side in the heat of passion. Under such circumstances there cannot be much room for discriminating between the respective degrees of blame with reference to the state of things at the commencement of the fray.²¹

This Exception requires three things :—

- (1) Sudden fight ;
- (2) absence of premeditation ; and
- (3) no undue advantage.

It matters not what the cause of the quarrel is, whether real or imaginary, or who draws or strikes first; provided the occasion be sudden, and not urged as a cloak for pre-existing malice.²² An unpremeditated assault (ending in an affray in which death is caused) committed in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel (it being immaterial which party offers the provocation, or commits the first assault) comes within this Exception.²³ If, on a sudden quarrel, blows pass without any intention to kill or seriously injure one another, and if one of those fighting, while in hot blood, in the course of the struggle, kills the other with a deadly weapon, this is not murder, but culpable homicide.²⁴

To bring a case within this Exception all the facts mentioned in it must be found.²⁵ If two men are fighting and one of them is unarmed while the other uses a deadly weapon, the one who uses such weapon must be held to have taken an undue advantage and is not entitled to the benefit of this Exception.¹ This Exception applies to cases in which there is no wish to kill or to hurt.²

The number of wounds is not the criterion, but the position of the combatants with regard to their arms and the use of those arms are considerations to be kept in mind when applying this Exception. Hence where the deceased was not armed but the accused was and he caused grievous hurt to the deceased with fatal results by causing only one wound, it was held that he was not protected by this Exception and the offence committed was that of murder.³

Sudden fight.—The word ‘sudden’ implies that the fight should not have been pre-arranged. A fight is not per se a palliating circumstance, only an unpremeditated fight is such."⁴ If, on any sudden quarrel, blows pass without any intention to kill or injure another materially, and, in the course of the scuffle, after the parties are heated by the contest, one kills the other with a deadly weapon, it is culpable homicide and not murder.⁵ The lapse of time between the quarrel and the fight is therefore a very important consideration. If there intervenes a sufficient time for passion to subside and for reason to interpose, the killing will be murder.⁶ The occasion must not only be sudden, but the party assaulted must be on an equal footing in point of defence, at least at the onset. This is peculiarly requisite where the attack is made with deadly or dangerous weapons.⁷ The word 'fight' is used to convey something more than a verbal quarrel. A man who inflicts a large injury in the abdomen of another, penetrating to the bowels, one of the most vital parts of the body, cannot be heard to say that he has not done this with the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom harm is caused (s. 300, 2ndly) or with the intention of causing bodily injury to any person and the bodily injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death (s. 300, 3rdly).⁸

If A has formed a deliberate design to kill B, and, after this, they meet and have a quarrel, and many blows pass, and A kills B, this will be murder, if the jury are of opinion that the death was in consequence of previous malice, and not of the sudden provocation.⁹

"If a person receives a blow, and immediately avenges it with any instrument that he may happen to have in his hand, then the offence will be only manslaughter, provided the blow is to be attributed to the passion of anger arising from that previous provocation, for anger is a passion to which good and bad men are both subject. But the law requires two things, first, that there should be that provocation, and secondly, that the fatal blow should be clearly traced to the influence of passion arising from that provocation. . . If you see that a person denotes, by the manner in which he avenges a previous blow, that he is not excited by a sudden transport of passion, but under the influence of that wicked disposition, that bad spirit, which the law terms 'malice', in the definition of wilful murder, then the offence would not be manslaughter. Suppose, for instance, a blow were given, and the party struck beat the other's head to pieces by continued, cruel, and repeated blows; then you could not attribute that act to the passion of anger, and the offence would be murder. And so if you find that, before the stroke is given, there is a determination to punish any man who gives a blow with such an instrument as the one which the prisoner used [viz., a sword stick], because, if you are satisfied that before the blow was given the prisoner meant to give a wound with such an instrument, it is impossible to attribute the giving such a wound to the passion of anger excited by that blow, for no man who was under proper feelings,—none but a bad man of a wicked and cruel disposition, would really determine beforehand to resent a blow with such an instrument."¹⁰ "It is not every slight provocation, even by a blow, which will, when the party receiving it strikes with a deadly weapon, reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter. But it depends upon the time elapsing between the blow and the injury; and also, whether the injury was inflicted with an instrument at the moment in the possession of the party, or whether he went to fetch it from another place. . . If you think that there was not time and interval sufficient for the passion of a man proved to be of no very strong intellect to cool, and for reason to regain her dominion over his mind, then you will say that the prisoner is guilty only of manslaughter. But if you think that the act was the act of a wicked, malicious and diabolical mind, . . . then you will find him guilty of murder."¹¹

Without the offender having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner.—Even if the fight is unpremeditated and sudden, yet if the instrument or manner of retaliation be greatly inadequate to the offence given, and cruel and dangerous in its nature, the accused cannot be protected under this Exception. This Exception cannot apply where the wounds inflicted on the person of the deceased cannot be said to have been given without the offender having taken undue advantage, irrespective of the fact that it happened in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel.¹² When this Exception is applicable at the beginning of a fight, it cannot be held that one of the participants has taken an undue advantage over the other, because the latter has acknowledged defeat and has turned tail, and thereupon the former combatant pursues the advantage which he has obtained.¹³

"When persons fight on fair terms, and merely with fists, where life is not likely to be at hazard, and the blows passing between them are not likely to occasion death, if death ensues—it is manslaughter; and if persons meet originally on fair terms, and, after an interval, blows having been given, a party draws in the heat of blood a deadly instrument, and inflicts a deadly injury, it is manslaughter only. But if a party enters a contest, dangerously armed, and fights under an unfair advantage, though mutual blows pass, it is not manslaughter, but murder."¹⁴

Cases.—Sudden fight.—Where the accused while smarting from a severe blow from a stick in the midst of a sudden fight and possibly apprehensive of further violence, finding a knife at hand, took it up, and in the melee inflicted a wound which caused the death of the deceased, it was held that the case fell within this Exception.¹⁵

A conviction for murder was held to be wrong in a case where the accused taking advantage of an incident which occurred in what till then had been a fair fight, struck his opponent, and knocked him over.¹⁶ Where a person, under heat of passion, on a sudden quarrel, snatched up a log of a heavy wood and struck another with it on a vital part with so much force and vindictiveness as to cause that other person's death almost on the spot, it was held that the offence committed was culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁷ A dispute having suddenly arisen concerning the cutting of a sugar-cane crop, three men armed with lathis attacked one of the men who were engaged in cutting the crop and beat him so severely that he died, his skull being broken in three places. It did not appear which of the injuries had been caused by which of the assailants who were acting in concert. It was held that the accused were guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder inasmuch as the matter was sudden and the injuries had been inflicted in the heat of passion.¹⁸ Where, in the course of a sudden fight, the deceased grappled with the accused from behind, and the accused then struck at him with his pocket knife without any deliberate aim, it was held that the accused did not intend to cause death or to inflict such injury as was likely to cause death, but as he must have known that a blow with a weapon of this kind was likely to cause death, the offence fell under cl. (2) of s. 304.¹⁹ Where there was a dispute between A and B with respect to a piece of land and when A tried to harrow the land, B sent his men to unyoke the bullocks. A sudden fight arose between A and B and their partisans in which A inflicted serious injuries on B with a knife and the latter died and A also suffered injuries but did not die, it was held that as death was caused in a sudden fight under grave provocation A was only guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.²⁰ Where the quarrel which led to the fight in which the deceased was killed was sudden and the parties had in all probability run to take part in the fight with the winnowing instruments which they were using in their respective threshing floors and fought with them, it was held that the offence committed was not murder, but culpable homicide not amounting to murder under s. 304, part 1.²¹

Undue advantage.—Where a person, during the course of a sudden fight, without premeditation and probably in the heat of passion, took undue advantage and acted in a cruel manner in using a knife or a dagger, it was held that there was no ground for holding that his act did not amount to murder.²² If two men are fighting and one of them is unarmed while the other uses a deadly weapon, the one who uses such a weapon must be held to have taken an undue advantage and not entitled to the benefit of this Exception.²³ Where a man used a hatchet on another unarmed man and struck him a blow on the head with that hatchet splitting his skull while he was under no reasonable apprehension of injury to himself, it was held that he could not claim the protection of this Exception.²⁴ Fighting under an advantage, if death ensues, is always murder.²⁵ The two accused, brothers, between whom and the deceased and his son was bad feeling, came upon the deceased in the fields and setting upon him, beat him with sticks so severely that he died within a few minutes, no less than fourteen ribs being fractured resulting in the rupture of both the lungs and of the spleen. It was held that they were guilty of murder as the intention was clear whether to kill or to cause dangerous injury.¹

Where the accused's party pursued the complainants in three boats for a long distance and then when they had them in their power landed and attacked them with spears and killed three of them, it was held that their action did not come within this Exception.²

13. Exception 5.—Death caused by consent of persons above age of eighteen years.—The authors of the Code give the following reasons for not punishing homicide by consent so severely as murder: "In the first place, the motives which prompt men to the commission of this offence are generally far more respectable than those which prompt men to the commission of murder. Sometimes it is the effect of a strong sense of religious duty, sometimes of a strong sense of honour, not unfrequently of humanity. The soldier who, at the entreaty of a wounded comrade, puts that comrade out of pain, the friend who supplies laudanum to a person suffering the torment of lingering disease, the freedman who in ancient times held out the sword that his master might fall in it, the high-born native of India who stabs the females of his family at their own entreaty in order to save them from the licentiousness of a band of marauders, would, except in Christian societies, scarcely be thought culpable, and even in Christian societies would not be regarded by the public, and ought not to be treated by the law as assassins.

"Again, this crime is by no means productive of so much evil to the community as murder. One evil ingredient of the utmost importance is altogether wanting to the offence of voluntary culpable homicide by consent. It does not produce general insecurity. It does not spread terror through society. When we punish murder with such signal severity, we have two ends in view; one end is, that people may not be murdered; another end is, that people may not live in constant dread of being murdered. The second end is perhaps the more important of the two. For if assassination were left unpunished, the number of persons assassinated would probably bear a very small proportion to the whole population; but the life of every human being would be passed in constant anxiety and alarm. This property of the offence of murder is not found in the offence of voluntary culpable homicide by consent. Every man who has not given his consent to be put to death is perfectly certain that this latter offence cannot at present be committed on him, and that it never will be committed unless he shall first be convinced that it is his interest to consent to it. We know that two or three midnight assassinations are sufficient to keep a city of a million of inhabitants in a state of consternation during several weeks, and to cause every private family to lay in arms and watchmen's rattles. 'No number of suicides, or of homicides committed with the unextorted consent of the person killed, could possibly produce such alarm among the survivors.'"³

This Exception refers to cases where a man consents to submit to the doing of some particular act, either knowing that it will certainly cause death, or that death will be the likely result; but it does not refer to the running of a risk of death from something which a man intends to avert if he possibly can do so, even by causing the death of the person from whom the danger is to be anticipated.⁴ It should receive a strict and not a liberal construction, and in applying the Exception it should be considered first with reference to the act consented to or authorized, and next with reference to the person or persons authorized, and as to each of those some degree of particularity at least should appear upon the facts proved before the Exception can be said to apply. It must be found that the person killed, with a full knowledge of the facts determined to suffer death, or take the risk of death; and that this determination continued up to, and existed at, the moment of his death.⁵ Pigot, J., observed: "I cannot read it [Exception 5] as referring to anything short of suffering the infliction of death, or running the risk of having death inflicted, under some definite circumstances not merely of time, but of the mode of inflicting it, specially consented to as for instance in the case of suttee, or of duelling, which were, no doubt, chiefly in the minds of the framers of the Code."⁶ The Exception will not apply where there is an agreement to fight between two riotous mobs armed with all sorts of weapons the character of which is left to individual choice. Where a person kills another who is more than eighteen years of age, and pleads it was done with the consent of the deceased, in circumstances in which the Court can hold that it is not impossible that the deceased feeling desperate and depressed asked to be killed, and no motive is proved against the accused for deliberately killing the deceased of his own free will, he is entitled to the benefit of this Exception.⁷

The consent given by the victim who though not yet eighteen is approaching that age mitigates the gravity of the offence of murder in the sense of making it unnecessary to pass the extreme sentence of death.⁸

Consent.—It must be such as has been defined in s. 90, supra.

Illustration.—The case supposed in the Illustration to this Exception is one of the offences expressly made punishable by s. 305.

English law.—Homicide is neither justified nor extenuated by reason of any consent given by the party killed. Exception 5, therefore, is a departure from the English law.

Cases.—Death caused by consent.—Where the accused caused a pile to be lighted, and persuaded a suttee to reascend it, after she had once left it, and she was burnt;⁹ where the accused acting upon the express desire of an adult emasculated him, and death ensued owing to the rough manner of the operation;¹⁰ where the accused was repeatedly requested by his wife, who was overwhelmed with grief at the death of her child, to kill her, did kill her one night while she was asleep;¹¹ where the accused killed his concubine at her request and with her own consent;¹² where certain snake charmers, by professing themselves able to cure snake-bites, induced several persons to let themselves be bitten by a poisonous snake, and from the effect of the bite three of such persons died;¹³ where the accused finding that his life had become unbearable owing to domestic troubles, decided to take his own life and began to load a gun for the purpose but this having come to the knowledge of his wife, she pressed him hard to kill her first, and in consequence of what she said and the taunts then given to him by his parents, he took her life by firing a shot at her;¹⁴ and where a woman expostulated her lover to kill her as owing to the scandal she was ashamed to go back to her village and she could not find a house to live in although she was wandering from place to place and she took a knife out of his waist, put it into his hand and asked him to cut and throw her away and be off, and he thereupon cut her neck and returned to his village,¹⁵ it was held in all those cases that the accused came under this Exception, because in all of them the element of consent had entered in a greater or less degree. The accused killed his stepfather, who was an infirm old man and an invalid, with the latter's consent, in order to get three innocent men, his own enemies, hanged. It was held that his act fell within this Exception and he was punishable under s. 304.¹⁶

Premeditated fight.—This Exception was held not to apply to a case where two bodies of men, for the most part armed with deadly weapons, deliberately entered into an unlawful fight, each being prepared to cause the death of the other, and aware that his own might follow, but determined to do his best in self-defence, and in the course of the struggle death ensued.¹⁷ In a case in which it was found that all the accused were armed with deadly weapons and were guilty of rioting, that the fight was premeditated and prearranged, a regular pitched battle or trial of strength between the two parties concerned in the riot, and that one of the accused in the course of the riot, and in prosecution of the common object of the assembly, killed or attempted to kill a man under such circumstances that his act amounted to an attempt to murder, the question arose whether that act would be said to bear a less grave character by reason of this Exception. It was held that upon such finding the case did not fall within the Exception.¹⁸

Death caused by voluntary act of deceased resulting from fear of violence.

—If a man creates in another man's mind an immediate sense of danger which causes such person to try to escape, and in so doing he injures himself, the person who creates such a state of mind is responsible for the injuries which result.¹⁹ "If, for instance, four or five persons were to stand round a man, and so threaten him and frighten him as to make him believe that his life was in danger, and he were to back away from them and tumble over a precipice to avoid them, then murder would have been committed."²⁰ "A man may throw himself into a river under such circumstances as render it not a voluntary act; by reason of force, applied either to the body or the mind. It becomes then the guilty act of him who compelled the deceased to take the step. But the apprehension must be of immediate violence, and well grounded, from the circumstances by which the deceased was surrounded; not that you must be satisfied that there was no other way of escape, but that it was such a step as a reasonable man might take."²¹ The act of the person attacking will, in such a case, amount to murder. Where the deceased was on horseback, and the accused struck him with a stick, and the deceased, from a well-grounded apprehension of a further attack, which would have endangered his life, spurred his horse, which became frightened, and threw him, giving him a mortal fracture, it was held that the accused was guilty of murder.²² Similarly, where the accused in unlawfully assaulting a girl, who at that time had in her arms an infant, so frightened the infant that it had convulsions, although previously healthy, and from the effects of which it eventually died in about six weeks, it was held that the accused was guilty of manslaughter.²³

It may be observed that the wording of this section and s. 307 does not seem to cover such acts.

301. If a person, by doing anything which he intends or knows to be likely to cause death, commits culpable homicide by causing the death of any person, whose death he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause, the culpable homicide committed by the offender is of the description of which it would have been if he had caused the death of the person whose death he intended or knew himself to be likely to cause.

Culpable homicide by causing death of person other than person whose death was intended.

COMMENT.

The doctrine inculcated in this section is called, by Hale and Foster, a transfer of malice. Others describe it as a transmigration of motive. Coke calls it coupling the event with the intention and the end with the cause. If the killing take place in the course of doing an act which a person intends or knows to be likely to cause death, it ought to be treated as if the real intention of the killer had been actually carried out.

"It is common knowledge that a man who has an unlawful and malicious intent against another, and, in attempting to carry it out, injures a third person, is guilty of what the law deems malice against the person injured, because the offender is doing an unlawful act, and has that which the Judges call general malice, and that is enough."²⁴

Where a mistake is made in respect of the person, as where the offender shoots at A supposing that he is shooting at B, it is clear that the difference of person can make none in the offence or its consequences; the crime consists in the wilful doing of a prohibited act; the act of shooting at A was wilful, although the offender mistook him for another.

Similarly, there will be no difference where the injury intended for one falls on another by accident. If A makes a thrust at B, meaning to kill, and C throwing himself between, receive the thrust and die, A will answer for it as if his mortal purpose had taken place on B.

The same principle is applicable where, through accident, or the mistake of a party not privy to the criminal design, the mischief falls either on a person not intended, or on the party intended, but in a different manner from that intended. A designing to poison her own child, who lived in the house of B, delivered to B a bottle of poison, with directions to administer a portion of it to the child; B, not knowing that the bottle contained poison, left it on the mantelpiece in her house, having forgotten to administer any portion of it to the child; during her absence C, the son of B (a child of five years old), finding the bottle on the mantelpiece, administered a portion to the child of A, and the child died of the poison, it was held that A was guilty of murder.²⁵

If A counsel B to poison his wife, B accordingly obtains poison from A and gives it to his wife in a roasted apple, the wife gives it to a child of B not knowing it contained poison, who eats it and dies, this is murder in B though he intended nothing to the child.¹

Scope.—This section has given rise to a difference of opinion as to its scope. In a Madras case² the accused, Suryanarayana, with the intention of killing one Appala Narasimhulu, on whose life the accused had effected large insurances without his knowledge and in order to obtain the sums for which he was insured, gave him some sweetmeat (halva), in which a poison containing arsenic and mercury in soluble form had been mixed. Appala ate a portion of the sweetmeat, and threw the rest away. This occurred at the house of the accused's brother-in-law where the accused had asked Appala to meet him. One Rajalakshmi, the daughter of the accused's brother-in-law aged eight or nine years, picked up the sweetmeat without the knowledge of the accused and ate it and gave some to another little child who also ate it. The two children died from the effects of the poison but Appala Narasimhulu, though the poison severely affected him, eventually recovered. The accused was sentenced to transportation for life by the Sessions Judge for having attempted to murder Appala Narasimhulu, but he was acquitted on the count of murdering the two children. On appeal against the acquittal, Benson and Abdur Rahim, J.J., held that the accused was guilty of murder, but Sundara Aiyar, J., held that he was not. Benson, J., observed : "The section does not enact any rule not deducible from the two preceding sections, but it declares in plain language an important rule deducible, as we have seen, from those sections, just as an explanation to a section does. The rule could not well be stated as an explanation to either s. 299 or s. 300 as it relates to both. It was, therefore, most convenient to state the rule by means of a fresh section. The rule makes it clear that culpable homicide may be committed by causing the death of a person whom the offender neither intended, nor knew himself to be likely, to kill, a rule which though it does not lie on the surface of s. 299 yet is, as we have seen, deducible from the generality of the words 'causes death' and from the illustration to the section ; and the rule then goes on to state that the quality of the homicide, that is, whether it amounts to murder or not, will depend on the intention or knowledge which the offender had in regard to the person intended or known to be likely to be killed or injured, and not with reference to his intention or knowledge with reference to the person actually killed a rule deducible from the language of the ss. 299 and 300 though not, perhaps, lying on their very surface." Sundara Aiyar, J., said : "That section apparently applies to a case where the death of the person whose death was intended or known to be likely to occur by the person doing the act, does not, as a fact, occur but the death of some one else occurs as the result of the act done by him. It evidently does not apply where the death both of the person whose death was in contemplation and of another person or persons, has occurred. Can it be said that, in such a case, the doer of the act is guilty of homicide with reference to those whose death was not intended by him and could not have been foreseen by him as likely to occur ? Are we to hold that a man who knows that his act is likely to cause the death of one person is guilty of the death of all the others who happen to die, but whose death was far beyond his imagination ? Such a proposition it is impossible to maintain in criminal law. Section 301...has reference to a case where a person intending to cause the death of A, say by striking or shooting him, kills B because B is in the place where he imagined A to be, or B rushes in to save A and receives the injury intended for A. The reason for not exculpating the wrong-doer in such cases is that he must take the risk of some other person being in the place where he expected to find A, or, of some one else intervening between him and A. The section is a qualification of the rule laid down in s. 299 and is evidently confined to cases where the death of the person intended or known to be likely to be killed does not result...If a person is intended by s. 299 to be held to be guilty for deaths which are not known to be likely to occur, then that section might itself have been worded differently so as to show that the particular death caused need not have been intended or foreseen and, what is more important, s. 301...would not be limited to cases where the death of the particular individual intended or foreseen does not occur. The general theory of the criminal law is that the doer of an act is responsible only for the consequences intended or known to be likely to ensue ; for otherwise he could not be said to have caused the effect 'voluntarily', and a person is not responsible for the involuntary effects of his acts. Illustrations A and B in my opinion support this view. Sections 323 and 324 show that a person is responsible in the case of hurt or grievous hurt only for what he causes voluntarily ; and s. 321 shows that hurt to the particular person in question must have been intended or foreseen. In the eye of the law, no doubt, a man will be taken to have foreseen what an ordinary individual ought to foresee, and it will not be open to him to plead that he himself was so foolish as, in fact, not to foresee the consequence of his act. A person might in some cases be responsible for effects of which his act is not the proximate cause where the effect is likely to arise in the ordinary course of events to result from the act. This rule will certainly hold good where a person's act set in motion only physical causes which lead to the effects actually occurring ; when the effect is not due merely to physical causes set in operation by an act, but other persons' wills intervening are equally necessary causes with the original act to lead to the result, it is more difficult to decide whether the act in question can be said to be the cause of the effect finally produced. The Code throws very little light on the question. Ordinarily, a man is not criminally responsible for the acts of another person, and ordinarily his act should not be held to be the cause of a consequence which would not result without the intervention of another human agency." Abdur Rahim, J., observed : "Obviously it is not possible to lay down any general test as to what should be regarded in criminal law as the responsible cause of a certain result when that result as it often happens is due to series of causes. We have to consider in each case the relative value and efficiency of the different causes in producing the effect and then to say whether responsibility should be assigned to a particular act or not as the proximate and efficient cause. But it may be observed that it cannot be a sufficient criterion in this connection whether the effect could have been produced in the case in question without a particular cause, for it is involved in the very idea of a cause that the result could not have been produced without it. Nor would it be correct to lay down generally that the intervention of the act of voluntary agent must necessarily absolve the person between whose act and the result it intervenes. For instance, if A mixes poison in the food of B with the intention of killing B and B eats the food and is killed thereby, A would be guilty of murder even though the eating of the poisoned food which was the voluntary act of B intervened between the act of A and B's death. So here the throwing aside of the sweetmeat by Appala Narasimhulu and the picking and the eating of it by Rajalakshmi cannot absolve the accused from responsibility for his act. No doubt the intervening acts or events may sometimes be such as to deprive the earlier act of the character of an efficient cause."

The Allahabad High Court has approved of the majority view in the Madras case. A woman was carrying on an intrigue with a man who gave her some poison to administer to her husband. She prepared sweetmeats mixed with the poison which were eaten by one M who died as the result thereof. The husband and three others also partook of the sweetmeats and suffered considerably but did not die. She, however, intended to kill her husband and not M. It was held that she was guilty of murder.³

CASES.

Where the accused intending to kill the husband of a woman, with whom he was carrying on an adulterous intrigue, waylaid him in the dusk, but by mistake killed a third party who came along the road;⁴ where the accused intending to kill B, killed A by a blow with a highly lethal weapon whom he had no intention of killing;⁵ where the accused gave some poisoned rice-water to an old woman who drank part herself and gave part to a little girl who died from the effect of the poison,⁶ it was held in all these cases that the offence committed was that of murder. Where the second accused procured oleander seeds and gave them to the first accused so that he might administer them to A in order to kill her in furtherance of a common intention, and the first accused crushed the seeds and mixed the powder and some arsenic in butter-milk and gave the butter-milk to A but the butter-milk was drunk by B and he died, it was held that both the accused were guilty under this section.⁷

302. Whoever commits murder shall be punished with death, or transportation for life, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

Where the Legislature recognizes two sorts of punishment it implicitly recognizes the existence of degrees in crimes technically the same. These degrees are to be determined by the circumstances of the case, and among them, and perhaps the most important of them, are the state of mind of the offender, and the degree of moral obliquity displayed by the act. There is an undoubted connection, though one not easily formulated, between the ethical quality of a crime and its proper punishment.

"Although the law has provided an alternative punishment, either is not to be passed indifferently at the discretion of a Judge; but...where the accused has been found guilty of deliberate murder, he must pass sentence of death, and...the minor sentence should only be awarded when there is some extenuating circumstance, some excuse which, though the law does not regard it as sufficient to reduce the killing to the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, still is ground for looking leniently on the act."⁸

The sentence consequent upon a conviction for murder must be death. If there exist any grounds for mercy, that circumstance will have to be considered by the Crown or its executive minister, and all that a Court of Justice can do is to submit a recommendation after passing the sentence of law.⁹ But the law lays down two sentences in cases of murder, and naturally the Court leans towards the more lenient sentence if it is consistent with the ends of justice.¹⁰ The Calcutta High Court is of opinion that attention should be paid to the age of the accused. Where, therefore, a girl of sixteen was charged with deliberately killing her husband by administering arsenic she was transported for life in consideration of her age.¹¹ The sentence of death is not passed if there are some extenuating circumstances. Where the accused murdered his wife under an unfounded suspicion as to her chastity, the sentence was reduced to transportation.¹² When convicting of murder the only discretion which the law allows to the Court is to determine which of the two punishments prescribed should be awarded, regard being had to the circumstances of the particular case.¹³ The fact that the accused had the capital sentences suspended over their heads for nearly six months is a matter for the consideration of the High Court. The sentence of death which might have been rightly passed by the Sessions Judge in the first instance ought not to be confirmed unless he thinks that such sentence should be carried out at the time final orders are passed.¹⁴

The Calcutta High Court is also of opinion that if two Judges of the Division Court differ as to the proper sentence to be passed, one favouring the death penalty and the other transportation for life, that itself is a sufficient ground for holding that the death penalty should not be inflicted.¹⁵

In Burma, where knives are freely used on the lightest occasion, it is unsafe to lay down as a general rule that mere absence of premeditation or deliberate intent to kill is a good ground for abstaining from passing a capital sentence in a case where a knife is used. To justify the passing of a sentence of transportation for life in cases of murder the Judge should find that there are really extenuating circumstances, not merely an absence of aggravating circumstances. The extreme sentence is the normal sentence; the mitigated sentence is the exception. It is not for the Judge to ask himself whether there are reasons for imposing the penalty of death but whether there are reasons for abstaining from doing so.¹⁶ It is not necessary to pass sentences of death on all the persons taking part in an ordinary murder as distinguished from murder in dacoity. A death sentence should be reserved for the principal offenders.¹⁷

The following are suggested as some reasons for not passing a capital sentence upon a conviction under s. 302:—

- (1) The offender being under eighteen years of age.
- (2) There having been no intention to commit murder, the offence falling under the fourth clause of section 300, Indian Penal Code.
- (3) The murder, though intentional, having been committed without premeditation, and in the heat of passion, without special brutality.

(4) The murder having been committed upon grave provocation, the provocation not being both grave and sudden so as to reduce the offence to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

(5) Reasonable doubt as to the sanity of the offender at the time of committing murder, actual insanity not being proved.

(6) Where murder has been committed by more than one person, and it appears that the offender acted under the instigation of another, and did not take a principal part in committing the murder.

This is not intended to be an exhaustive statement of reasons for not passing a capital sentence. In each case the Sessions Judge must exercise his own discretion with deliberation. The extreme penalty of the law should be reserved for cases of deliberate murder, for cases where murder is committed to facilitate the commission of some other offence or to avoid arrest for an offence, and for other heinous cases of murder".¹⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the death of a human being has actually taken place. That a murder has been committed by some one, is essentially necessary to be proved.

(2) That such death has been caused by, or in consequence of, the act of the accused.

Where there is no evidence to prove that the accused had anything to do with the death of the deceased, no conviction could stand.¹⁹

Where the medical evidence does not support that the deceased met with a violent death, no charge of murder can be brought home to any one.²⁰

(3) That such act was done with the intention of causing death;²¹ or that it was done with the intention of causing such bodily injury as (a) the accused knew to be likely to cause death; or (b) was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death; or that the accused caused death by doing an act known to him to be so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause (a) death, or (b) such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, the accused having no excuse for incurring the risk of causing such death or injury.

The Rangoon High Court has indicated the various stages of dealing with cases of homicide.²²

The mere fact that the bodily injury caused resulted in death in the ordinary course of nature, does not necessarily mean that the accused intended to cause such bodily injury.²³ There must always be a finding that the act which caused the death was done with the intention either of causing death or of causing bodily injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. A finding of inflicting an injury that was merely likely to cause death would not of necessity amount to murder.²⁴ The intention or knowledge with which the act which caused death was committed is not constructive or a presumption of law, but a matter of fact to be judged of in each case, and proof of collateral facts to explain the motives and designs of the accused is admissible.²⁵

Proof of motive or previous ill-will is not necessary to sustain a conviction for murder in a case where a person is coolly and barbarously put to death¹ or when the offender is caught red-handed while committing murder.² Where the fact of murder has been clearly established, it is by no means incumbent on the prosecution to show what particular motive actuated the criminal's mind and induced him to commit the particular crime.³ Where, however, the prosecution puts forward a substantive case as to the motive for the crime, the evidence regarding the motive has got to be considered in order to judge of the probabilities. Failure to prove motive, however, cannot outweigh the positive evidence as to the crime.⁴ The motive may never be discovered and the suggestion of a motive, possibly a wrong motive, may lead the Court astray.⁵ But motive for a crime, while it is always a satisfactory circumstance of corroboration when there is convincing evidence to prove the guilt of an accused person, can never supply the want of reliable evidence, direct or circumstantial, of the commission of the crime with which he is charged.⁶

The Lahore High Court has held that murders among Jats are actually committed from motives of pride to avenge what appear to be comparatively harmless insults.⁷ In cases in which death ensues from violence used, and there is no evidence of intention other than what is to be inferred from the accused's act, it is necessary to consider whether the accused must have known, when committing the act, that—

(a) it might possibly, but was unlikely to cause death or injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death;

(b) it was likely to cause death or injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death;

(c) it probably would cause death or injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.

If the act falls within the first category, it would not amount to more than hurt or grievous hurt; if under the second category, it would be culpable homicide not amounting to murder; if under the third category it would amount to murder.⁸

In a murder case the omission of the prosecution to show how the investigation proceeded step by step and to bring out in evidence the manner in which the various witnesses were traced is a serious defect.⁹

Suspensions, however strong, furnish no legal grounds for the conviction of an accused on a charge of wilful murder. Where there is no eye-witness to the actual commission of the murder the fact that there is very strong suspicion attaching to the accused in respect of the murder is not sufficient to convict him.¹⁰

The accused was charged with murder. The facts proved against him were: (1) Enmity against the deceased; (2) he was seen on the night of the murder digging in a field where the body of the deceased was subsequently found and, on being questioned, said he was digging out the stump of a tree; (3) on being questioned during the search of the deceased he gave false information; and (4) stains of human blood were found on his loin cloth though it had apparently been washed. It was held that having regard to the cumulative effect of the evidence the accused was rightly convicted of murder.¹¹

Onus.—The prosecution must prove the circumstances which ordinarily constitute the offence of murder; and the accused, the circumstances, if any, of exceptions which take the case out of that category.¹² The burden lies on the prosecution to establish that the act alleged to constitute murder was really the act of a person other than the deceased. The burden is not cast upon an accused person of proving that no crime has been committed though it has been established that the accused has special knowledge on the point whether a crime was committed or not.¹³ If a man takes away the life of another, the onus is on him to show circumstances which justify his doing so.¹⁴ The onus of proving grave and sudden provocation, such as would reduce the offence of murder to one of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, is on the accused.¹⁵

A trustworthy dying declaration corroborated by surrounding circumstances is sufficient to support a conviction for murder.¹⁶ No reliance can be placed on a dying declaration made at a time when the deceased must have come to know that the accused had been already named as the actual assailant.¹⁷

The accused on his trial is merely on the defensive and owes no duty to any one but himself. He cannot be convicted because he has not tried to explain to the Court how a death has occurred or by whose means.¹⁸ Where a Sessions Judge in a trial on a charge of gun-shot murder against N found that N and another person L were seen immediately after the report of the gun at the scene of occurrence each with a gun in his hand, but he did not find which of them fired the fatal shot, his only finding being that either N or L fired the shot that killed the deceased, and there was no finding in the judgment that N and L had a common intention and acted in concert and that the gun was fired in furtherance of their common intention, it was held that the legal inference from those findings must be that neither N nor L was guilty of the offence of murder.¹⁹

It is the duty of counsel in defending an accused to point out that the evidence is quite consistent with an explanation which fits in with accused's innocence. Where the accused is not represented, or not properly represented, the Judge is bound to ask himself whether there is any rational explanation of the evidence which is consistent with the innocence of the accused, and, if there is, he is not justified in convicting. A reasonable explanation of the evidence should not be rejected because not offered by the accused.²⁰

In a case of murder it is unsafe to rely upon the evidence of witnesses who have resiled from their previous statements. Where the evidence given at the trial did not implicate the accused but the earlier statements recorded under ss. 288 and 164, Criminal Procedure Code, tended to implicate him and the motive alleged was not proved, it was held that the conviction for murder could not be sustained.²¹

Circumstantial evidence.—A conviction on circumstantial evidence cannot be based unless and until all the inferences to be drawn from the whole history of the case point so strongly to the commission of the crime by the accused that the defence theory appears on the face of it impossible or highly improbable. The charge of murder, like any other charge of an offence, can be established by inferences, but when there is extremely little in the way of direct evidence it is due to the accused that there should be no exaggeration of minor incidents in the case and that each inference against him should be verified with scrupulous accuracy.²² Circumstantial evidence in order to furnish a basis for conviction requires a high degree of probability, that is, sufficiently high that a prudent man, considering all the facts and realizing that the life or liberty of the accused depends upon the decision, feels justified in holding that the accused committed the crime.²³ Circumstantial evidence must be consistent, and consistent only with the guilt of the accused; if the evidence is consistent with any other rational explanation, then there is an element of doubt of which the accused must be given the benefit. One of the circumstances which has to be taken into account is the fact that the accused has offered no explanation, or has offered a particular explanation; but it must be borne in mind that the accused cannot go into the witness-box, and is not bound to give any explanation at all. The fact that he does not open his mouth cannot be used against him. Often the accused is an illiterate person, and makes a statement under s. 362, Criminal Procedure Code, which is obviously untrue, or he is not prepared to admit anything.²⁴ Where the evidence against the accused is circumstantial in order to justify the inference of guilt, the inculpatory facts must be incompatible with the innocence of the accused and incapable of explanation upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt.²⁵ It is unsafe to convict a person of murder on circumstantial evidence, where the separate pieces of circumstantial evidence relating to the movements of the accused and which converge on their guilt bear palpable signs of conviction and do not fit in with the conduct of rational persons.¹ In a case of murder by opium poisoning the prosecution evidence that the accused put some sugar into the vessel in which milk was given to the deceased and stirred the milk with his finger after putting the sugar into it and the deceased died a few hours afterwards, was held to be not sufficient for convicting the accused, particularly when the motive for murder was not strong and the habit of eating opium was common among the class of people to which the deceased belonged.² If it is proved that a person was found, soon after the murder of another person, in possession of property which was on the person of the latter when last seen alive, an inference might be drawn in some circumstances that he obtained possession of the property by the murder of the deceased; but it is essential to justify the inference that there is satisfactory proof that the property was in fact in the possession of the deceased when last seen alive.³ Where the wife of the accused met her death by an unnatural cause, for instance, breaking of her several ribs, the husband was held to be not guilty of murdering her simply on suppositions, as there was nothing very strong connecting him with causing her death intentionally. The mere fact of his trying, with the help of others, to burn the body secretly or taking it in a bundle instead of, as usual, on a bed or litter though suspicious was considered by the Court to be not sufficient evidence of his guilt. An effort to dispose of the body of a dead person in an unusual way is sometimes due to fright of a weak-minded person which can be based on several grounds. But no person can be convicted of an offence on pure circumstantial evidence so long as it is compatible with his innocence.⁴ A conviction for murder cannot be sustained where the only circumstantial evidence against the accused was that the deceased was seized by the accused and the husband of the deceased in the road, placed on a camel, carried towards a canal in which her body was afterwards found completely dismembered, specially when the evidence of identification of the body is unsatisfactory and there is no direct evidence connecting the accused with the commission of the crime.⁵ Where unexplained possession of stolen property belonging to a deceased person is the only circumstance appearing in the evidence against an accused charged with murder and theft, he cannot be convicted of murder unless it is satisfactorily proved that possession of property could not have been transferred from the deceased to the accused except by the former being murdered.⁶ This case has not been followed in a subsequent case in which it is held that when things, which were on a murdered person's body at the time when he was murdered, are traced to a person accused of the murder and he admits having concealed those things and fails to give any explanation for their possession, those may be important facts for use in making an inference that the accused took part in the murder.⁷ The possession of stolen goods recently after the loss of them may be indicative not merely of the offence of larceny, or of receiving with guilty knowledge, but of any other more aggravated crime which has been connected with theft; this particular fact of presumption commonly forms also a material element of evidence in cases of murder, while special application of it has often been emphatically recognised.⁸ Where in the case of a prosecution for murder the only fact that was proved was that the dead body of the deceased was recovered from the house of the accused, buried in one of the rooms inside his house, but the accused was in jail at the time of the recovery, it was held that the accused could not be called upon to explain how the corpse of the deceased came to be buried in his house. Had the accused been present in his house at the time of the recovery of the corpse from his house he could certainly have been called upon to explain the fact.⁹

In a murder case a Court has to be satisfied not of the probabilities but of the certainty beyond any reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty.¹⁰

Where a woman is charged with the murder of her new-born infant, there must be evidence to show that the child was born alive. The fact that the lungs on section floated in water is not an infallible test of live-birth.¹¹

The evidence of blood-stained nails is not only of no value but may be extremely dangerous to innocent persons. It has frequently been given in the past as evidence corroborating an approver or as circumstantial evidence connecting an accused person with homicide. It may have led to the miscarriage of justice.¹²

Eye-witness.—There is no rule of law that if there be no eye-witnesses to a murder, the accused should not be sentenced to death. It is not difficult to produce false evidence of eye-witnesses. It is, on the other hand, extremely difficult to produce circumstantial evidence of a convincing character and therefore circumstantial evidence, if convincing, is more cogent than the evidence of eye-witnesses.¹³

Demeanour.—It is not safe to base a conviction of culpable homicide only on the evidence of accused's demeanour.¹⁴

Confession.—If A and B are jointly tried for the murder of C, a confession of A is admissible against B.¹⁵ If A is accused of killing C, any statement made by C before his death as to the cause of it is receivable in evidence.¹⁶

Discovery of body of person murdered not absolutely necessary.—Lord Hale laid down: "I would never convict any person of murder or manslaughter, unless the fact were proved to be done, or at least the body found dead".¹⁷ This is a rule of caution and not of law. If the circumstantial evidence is very strong a conviction could be made.¹⁸

The term corpus delicti is an invention of the jurists of the Middle Ages, and was used by them to denote the whole of the facts which constitute the crime of killing when the body of the killed had been found. A mixture of German and Roman views led to the proposition (which has found its way into English penal law) that the proof of the aggregate of facts constituting the offence failed when the body was not found. The expression was then extended to other offences, and was used to denote that the qualities necessary to bring a fact within the operation of a rule of criminal law had been shown to attach to the fact. The jurists of the Middle Ages, however, never conceived the dead body in murder, or the object stolen in theft, to be that 'corpus'. The expression itself has many vices, but in the sense in which its authors used it is at least intelligible.¹⁹

The mere fact that the body of the murdered person has not been found is not a ground for refusing to convict the accused person of murder. To recognize any such condition precedent, as being absolutely necessary to conviction in all cases, would be to afford complete immunity and certain escape to those murderers who are cunning or clever enough to make away with or destroy the bodies of their victims. Such a principle once admitted would in some instances render the administration of justice impossible.²⁰ But when the body of the person said to have been murdered is not forthcoming, the strongest possible evidence as to the fact of the murder should be insisted on before an accused is convicted.²¹ The absence of the dead body makes the onus upon the prosecution much heavier than in ordinary cases.²² Where the circumstances are such as to make it morally certain that a crime has been committed, the inference that it was so committed is as safe as any other such inference.²³ But a Judge exercises a proper discretion in not passing a sentence of death in a case in which the dead body has not been found.²⁴ Where the dead body does not appear and the factum of death is established by nothing but a retracted confession, sentence of transportation may be awarded instead of the heavier sentence.²⁵ But it has been held that where the Court is convinced that the man was dead, death sentence may be passed even if the body has not been found. The question of sentence should be determined upon the gravity of the offence quite irrespective of the circumstance whether the body has or has not been discovered.¹

If the accused confess in the most circumstantial manner to having committed a murder, the finding of the body is not absolutely essential to a conviction.² The Bombay High Court in a case held the accused guilty of attempt to murder where the body was not found but the accused had admitted that he had thrown a girl of less than two years of age into a canal, where the water was deep, and swollen by the monsoon.³ In a later case the High Court observed that "it may also be conceded that if the body is not found one requires stronger evidence of the killing than would otherwise be necessary. But the quantity and nature of the evidence necessary to convince the Court must depend on the circumstances of the case."⁴ Before a conviction of murder can be obtained, the Court must be satisfied that the person alleged to have been murdered is actually dead. A man was brutally beaten with lathis into unconsciousness by the accused who, subsequently, dragged him along the ground up to a certain river, leaving traces of blood both on the fields and on the railway line. The man had never been seen since. It was held that the conclusion that he was dead could not be arrived at though it was exceedingly unlikely that he was alive. In the circumstances the accused were not convicted of murder under s. 302 but of an attempt to murder under s. 307.⁵

In a charge of child murder, the only evidence was the confession of the accused, and no dead body of the child was found. The jury acquitted the accused of murder, and found her guilty of concealment of birth. It was held that there was no sufficient evidence of a separate existence of the child to convict of murder, but sufficient to convict for concealment of birth, although no dead body had been found.⁶

Bombay Circulars.—In murder cases the constable or other person, who took the corpse to the Medical Officer for post-mortem examination, should always be sent to the Sessions Court as a witness.⁷ In all important criminal cases, and especially in cases of murder and dacoity, it is desirable that the Police Officer by whom the investigation was conducted should be in readiness to be examined, if necessary, as witness in regard to the circumstances of the investigation. The Police Officer should bring with him his diary of the case and also the memorandum of the statement of the witnesses taken down by him under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.⁸

When death or grievous hurt has been caused by a blow from a stick or other weapon, the weight and dimensions of the weapon should be stated in the Sessions Court proceedings, with such particularity as may enable the High Court (which has no opportunity of seeing it) to form an opinion as to the character of the weapon and the intention with which it was probably used. The mere entry of "a stick" or "a stone" in the list of property produced before the Sessions Court does not enable the High Court to judge whether the stick or the stone was deadly or a comparatively harmless weapon.⁹

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Where culpable homicide has been committed, prima facie, the principal issue is : whether the culpable homicide does or does not amount to murder. In all ordinary cases, the issue ought to be tried, and ought not to be prejudged, by any authority less than the authority of a Court of Session.¹⁰ It is the duty of the Court first of all to consider whether the case is not of murder as defined in s. 300, and if it considers that it does not fall within the definition, to give reasons. If the accused intended to cause such injuries as were likely to result in death it must be presumed that they knew that such injuries were likely to cause death as a person must be presumed to know the natural consequences of his act. The first part of s. 304 should be applied only where the offence is not murder by reason of its falling within one of the Exceptions in s. 300.¹¹

If the accused is convicted of an offence punishable with death, and the Court sentences him to any punishment other than death, the Court shall in its judgment state the reason why a sentence of death was not passed.¹²

If the case falls under one of the Exceptions to s. 300 and the Judge convicts the accused on the charge of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, he should record under which of the Exceptions the case falls.¹³

In cases where it is difficult to determine whether the offence committed by the accused is culpable homicide or culpable homicide amounting to murder the accused should be convicted of the lesser offence.¹⁴

The law prescribes only two possible punishments for murder—death or transportation for life. It is the duty of the Sessions Judge to examine every commitment order bearing this in mind, and if there is any possibility that murder has been committed he must either try the case himself, or send it to an Additional Sessions Judge, if one is available. Should a Court not empowered to impose the legal sentence find that a case of this type has been inadvertently transferred to it, it should not proceed to try it, but should return the case at once to the transferring authority for necessary orders.¹⁵

Chemico-legal and post-mortem examinations.—See Chapter X of the Madras High Court Rules of Criminal Practice ; c. 8 of the Lahore Rules, Vol. 2, pp. 55-70; s. 105 of the Oudh Criminal Digest ; and s. 218 of the Upper Burma Court Manual.

A post-mortem report is not evidence, and can only be used by the witness who conducted the post-mortem enquiry as an aid to memory.¹⁶

Poisoning.—Judges who try cases of murder by poisoning should invariably put beyond the possibility of doubt the identification of every single thing that is suspected to contain any poison. The evidence should be complete as to the history of such articles and it should be shown that they were kept in proper custody throughout if they are to be relied on as supporting a conviction, and there should be no possibility of any question being raised as to the identity of any such article.¹⁷ Where the accused was proved to have put some powder in the food, which was found by the Chemical Examiner to contain poison, but there was no statement or evidence of the quantity of poison found in the food, or of the probable effect on any one who might have eaten it, it was held that the accused could not be regarded, under the circumstances, to have intended to cause anything more than hurt and could only be convicted of attempt to commit an offence under s. 328.¹⁸ Before a person can be convicted of murder by poisoning, it is essential to prove that the death of the deceased was caused by poison, that the poison in question was in the possession of the accused, and that the poison was administered to the deceased by the accused. Where the cause of death cannot be ascertained with certainty, a conviction for murder by poisoning cannot be sustained.¹⁹ Where the accused who had contracted illicit relations with a man and was delivered of a child was charged with having put the infant to death and it appeared that she was in possession of opium four days before the child's birth and the death of the child was found to be due to opium, it was held that the only reasonable inference was that the accused had caused the death of the child by administering opium to it.²⁰

In a trial for murder by arsenic poisoning the prosecution must prove that the deceased died of such poisoning; that the accused administered arsenic to the deceased with intent to murder. If the prosecution wishes to establish the first proposition by means of the Chemical Examiner, and weight is to be attached to his evidence, he must be called, sworn, and offered for cross-examination. By his evidence he must prove that at least two grains of arsenic were administered to the deceased before death. He can do this by proving the discovery of this amount in the body of the deceased, or by accounting for its absence in part. He may attribute the loss to vomiting, purging, or the natural elimination of the poison from the body before death,—taking into consideration the lapse of time between the hour arsenic had been taken and the hour of death.²¹ Mere examination of vomit or night-soil is insufficient to prove conclusively death from arsenic poisoning.²² It is not enough for the Chemical Examiner merely to state his opinion that arsenic was detected. He must state the grounds on which he arrives at that opinion. In India the Chemical Examiner merely tenders a report and he does not appear and give evidence. It is therefore extremely desirable that his report should be full and complete and take the place of evidence which he would give if he were called to Court as a witness.²³ When a report is received from the Chemical Examiner containing a quantitative analysis, it should be shown to the medical officer who conducted the post-mortem examination so that he may be in a position to state before the committing Magistrate what are the medico-legal inferences to be drawn from the report.

Pleader for defence.—See Bombay High Court Criminal Circular Orders, (1931 Ed.), Ch. IV, s. 74, p. 49, as regards the orders issued for the appointment of counsel or pleader for the defence in murder cases.²⁴

Plea of guilty.—‘Murder’ is a technical word and unless it is explained as directed by s. 300, the plea of guilty should not be accepted. The nature of the offence should be properly explained to the accused.²⁵ In capital cases where there is any doubt as to whether an accused person fully understands the meaning and effect of a plea of guilty it is advisable for the Court to take evidence and not to convict solely on the plea of the accused.¹ It is not in accordance with the usual practice to accept a plea of guilty in a case where the natural sequence will be a sentence of death.² Before such a plea can be accepted the record should clearly show that the person who is charged understands and admits such facts as would bring his offence within the definition of murder.³ It is the practice of the Sessions Courts in the Bombay Province never to accept a plea of guilty to a capital charge. There is, however, no reason why, if proper safeguards are taken, such a plea should not be accepted. Such safeguards must include the accused's representation by counsel who must be in a position to answer the questions of the Court, with regard to whether the accused knows what he is doing and the consequences of his plea and also a medical report or medical evidence upon him. Unless such safeguards are taken and unless the Judge is prepared to accept a plea of guilty, the proper course is to tell the accused that he should “claim to be tried”, and if he refuses to claim to be tried, to record the plea of “does not plead”.⁴

If the accused in answer to a charge of murder states that he committed the offence but alleges provocation, such a statement does not amount to a plea of guilty on the charge. He must be put on his trial in order to ascertain whether the provocation was grave and sudden enough to prevent the offence from amounting to murder.⁵

Admissions dispensing with proof of facts.—Except by a plea of guilty, admissions dispensing with proof, as distinguished from admissions which are evidential, are not permitted in a criminal trial. In a murder case, no consent or admission by the accused's advocate to dispense with the medical witness can relieve the prosecution of proving by evidence the nature of the injuries received by the deceased and that the injuries were the cause of death; and the conviction that has taken place in the absence of such evidence cannot stand.⁶

Charge to jury in case of provocation.—In charging the jury on the point of provocation in a case of culpable homicide a Judge should tell the jury that, to bring the case within the exception, the accused must have been deprived of the power of self-control by grave and sudden provocation, that there ought to have been sufficient cause for such loss of self-control, and that the provocation was not voluntarily provoked by the accused as an excuse for doing harm.⁷

It is the duty of the Judge to explain the distinctions between murder and culpable homicide, and the jury as judges of facts have to decide the issue about sufficient provocation.⁸

Direction as to commitment.—Calcutta Circular.—In cases where death appears to have resulted from injuries voluntarily inflicted by the party accused, Magistrates ought to be very careful not to take it upon themselves to absolve the accused from the graver charge and convict him of hurt or grievous hurt only, unless they are quite clear that there is no sufficient evidence to warrant a commitment to the Sessions for murder, or culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁹

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc..) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, did commit murder by intentionally (or knowingly) causing the death of (specify the name of the deceased), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

The intent or knowledge necessary to constitute murder should be set out in the charge.¹⁰ The charge should follow the language of s. 300.¹¹

Where an accused is charged with murdering one person he cannot be convicted for attempting to murder another person for there are two different offences.¹²

Punishment.—"The extreme sentence is the normal sentence: the mitigated sentence is the exception. It is not for the Judge to ask himself whether there are reasons for imposing the penalty of death, but whether there are reasons for abstaining from doing so".¹³ Where a murder is by a bully, a man armed with a deadly weapon against a man who is unarmed, the proper sentence is that of death.¹⁴ Where the murder is premeditated, cold-blooded and brutal, extreme penalty must be imposed.¹⁵ The fact that the sentence of death passed on a co-accused was commuted by the executive Government is no judicial consideration for not passing the sentence of death on the accused.¹⁶ The fact that the murderer had no personal grudge against his victim and was either a hired murderer or one who was ready to kill another in order to please his master or landlord is no ground for not passing the capital sentence.¹⁷

The Federal Court has power, where there has been inordinate delay in executing death sentences in cases which come before it, to allow the appeal in so far as the death sentence is concerned and substitute a sentence of transportation for life on account of the time factor alone, however right the death sentence was at the time when it was originally imposed. But this is a jurisdiction which very closely entrenches on the powers and duties of the executive in regard to sentences imposed by Courts. It is a jurisdiction which any Court should be slow to exercise.¹⁸ If the presiding Judge does not pass the sentence of death, he is bound to record the reasons why death sentence was not passed,¹⁹ that is to say, he must find that there are really extenuating circumstances and not merely an absence of aggravating circumstances.²⁰ A woman threw her children into a well and jumped into the well herself but afterwards, repenting of her intention to take her own life, managed to get out. The reason why she had decided to take her children's life and her own was that she had been very harshly treated by her husband and was living a life of the utmost misery, she was convicted for murdering the children. It was held that the sentence of transportation for life was proper and not that of death.²¹ Where in a case of murder, the circumstances are such as to justify the imposition of the lesser penalty the Sessions Judge himself can do so and it is not necessary to pass a sentence of death and to recommend that in the circumstances of the case, the Government might commute the death penalty.²² Whilst bearing in mind that the primary responsibility for the sentence is his, he should not lose sight of the fact that, should he pass sentence of death, the matter will further be considered by the High Court before the sentence is confirmed. Where a sentence of transportation for life has been passed, there are manifest objections to enhancing it even when a sentence of death ought to have been passed. There is no such objection to commuting a sentence of death to one of transportation for life, and such commutation should not be considered as any reflection on the way in which the Sessions Judge has exercised the discretion given him by law.²³ Where on a conviction for murder the Sessions Court awarded a sentence lesser than death, the High Court will not enhance the sentence, unless it is satisfied that, on the evidence in the case, the sentence of death is the only possible sentence which could have been passed by the Sessions Court.²⁴ If the Court is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty of murder and the circumstances require the imposition of the death penalty, the fact that the conviction is based on circumstantial evidence is not a reason for passing the lesser sentence allowed by law.²⁵ In passing sentence on an accused person convicted of the offence of murder, regard should be had to the circumstances of the case. Where the accused is convicted of murder only by reason of his case coming under cl. (4) of s. 300, a sentence of death is uncalled for.¹ Where the condition of the accused rendered it likely that if he were hanged, decapitation would ensue, the sentence of death was commuted to one of transportation for life.²

The Federal Court of India has held that it cannot be laid down that in the case of a conviction under this section read with s. 149 the appropriate sentence in all cases must be transportation for life. The question of sentence must in each case depend upon the facts of the case. If there is a finding that the accused, though they were among the rioters some of whom, in pursuance of the common object of the unlawful assembly as at that stage constituted, committed the murder, had themselves taken no part in the assault upon the deceased, the lesser sentence would meet the ends of justice in their case. Where there is no such finding but on the contrary it is found that the accused were among those who inflicted the injuries received by the deceased, the sentence of death cannot be said to be inappropriate.³

Delay in making reference.—The accused were sentenced to transportation for life instead of death, on account of the delay occasioned by the making of a reference to the full bench when the case was pending before the High Court.⁴

Absconding accused.—In a case of murder in which the extreme penalty of the law is called for, the circumstance that the murderer absconded for a number of years before he was brought to trial is not by itself a ground for reducing the sentence of death to one of transportation for life.⁵

Absence of premeditation.—The mere absence of premeditation may or may not form in every case of murder a sufficient ground for imposing the lesser penalty.⁶ Where the murder committed is not premeditated in any way but is the result of impulse and temper, the proper sentence is one of transportation for life, though the assault was a violent one.⁷ Where an assault followed a sudden quarrel without premeditation and the accused came from a peaceful trading class, the extreme penalty was not inflicted.⁸ Where murder, even if not premeditated, is carried out with deliberate and persistent ferocity, the only proper sentence to be passed in such a case is one of death.⁹ The fact that an accused person is about twenty years of age and that his act was prompted by feelings of veneration for the founder of his religion and anger at one who had scurrilously attacked him is not a sufficient reason for not imposing the extreme penalty.¹⁰ Where both the assailants of the deceased were armed with kirpans and both of them used them, the offence committed was murder and the bare fact that there was only one fatal blow and it was not known which of the two appellants caused it was not sufficient to reduce the offence to one under s. 304-II or s. 225. But the fact that the origin of the assault was shrouded in obscurity was sufficient ground for not exacting the extreme penalty of law.¹¹

Benefit of doubt.—An accused person is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt in the matter of sentence as in the matter of conviction.¹² A feeling of doubt as to the guilt of the accused is a matter to be considered by the tribunal before but not after the verdict and has no place in the determination of the sentence after conviction. The law does not recognize the right of a judicial tribunal to give effect to more than one degree of doubt.¹³

The sentence of transportation for life was never intended to be imposed in a case where there appears to be some doubt. If the Court at the end of a case is left in any reasonable doubt about the matter, it must acquit; but on the other hand if it is left in no reasonable doubt concerning the guilt of the accused, the appropriate penalty must in all cases be imposed. Where there is a doubt in a murder case, the Court should not and cannot pass a sentence of transportation for life.¹⁴

It is not permissible for a Judge to sentence a prisoner to transportation for life on the ground that he is sufficiently certain of the guilt but not sufficiently certain to sentence him to death.¹⁵ A Judge should not sentence a person accused of murder to transportation for life, instead of sentencing him to death, merely on the ground that the evidence is not strong enough to justify an irrevocable sentence. If the Court has any doubt as to the guilt of the accused it should acquit him.¹⁶

inasmuch as K and D did not commence the attack on S, and it was doubtful whether S was not dead when they struck him, transportation for life was an adequate punishment for their offence.¹⁷

Bona fide dispute.—The minimum sentence that a Court can pass under this section is transportation for life. But where both the parties had fought in the bona fide belief that they were in the right a recommendation to the Provincial Government for reduction of sentence under s. 401, Criminal Procedure Code, may be made.¹⁸

Constructive liability.—It is not necessary to impose the major penalty of death for a constructive liability for murder when the accused were presumably acting in the exercise of a supposed right and it does not appear that any of them personally set out with the deliberate intention of causing death.¹⁹

Custom of killing for unchastity.—The Baluchi custom of killing for unchastity cannot be taken into consideration in mitigation of sentence to be passed under this section.²⁰

Drunkenness.—Although s. 86 attributes to a drunken man the knowledge of a sober man when judging of his action, it does not give him the same intention, and, therefore, drunkenness or a state of intoxication affords a sufficient excuse for not exacting the extreme penalty of the law.²¹ Pal Singh's case has been distinguished in a subsequent case in which it is said that in the former the accused had no motive to cause the death of his victim and that the attack was a sudden one. Where, however, the accused primed themselves with drink in order to wreak vengeance upon their enemy and beat him mercilessly, the penalty of death was inflicted.²² Unless drunkenness amounts to unsoundness of mind so as to enable insanity to be pleaded by way of defence, or the degree of drunkenness is such as to establish incapacity in the accused to form the intent necessary to constitute the crime, drunkenness is neither a defence nor a palliation.²³ Drunkenness even though voluntary could be taken as a sufficient justification in proper cases for not imposing the capital sentence.²⁴ Accused challenged the deceased to fight with him and on the refusal of the latter pushed his head and asked him to assault the accused. Thereupon the deceased gave him a blow. Immediately the accused drew a knife and inflicted several fatal wounds as a result of which the deceased died immediately. It was held that the accused was guilty of murder as an intention to cause death could be inferred from the nature of the injuries put that as the parties were drunk and as the first blow was struck by the deceased the lesser penalty should be imposed.²⁵

Excitement.—When the accused commits a murder in a moment of extreme excitement the lesser sentence of transportation for life is the appropriate sentence.¹

Father and son.—Where father and son jointly commit murder and the son may well have been under the influence of the father, the son will be awarded the lesser punishment of transportation for life.²

Infants.—Under the several Children Acts, no child under the age of fourteen years shall be sentenced to death or transportation.³

Injuries sustained by accused.—Severe injuries sustained by the accused are not sufficient to mitigate the punishment, especially when the attack upon the deceased was deliberate and pursued to a fatal end.⁴

Insulting language.—Insulting language used by the deceased towards the accused though not enough to entitle him to the benefit of the first Exception is a mitigating circumstance to reduce the sentence to one of transportation for life.⁵

Jointly committing murder.—The Patna High Court has held that in deciding as to whether some or all of a number of persons are to be sentenced to death after a conviction for murder, prima facie all the persons convicted should be sentenced to the extreme penalty and it is only where special circumstances are shown in favour of any individual that the Court sentences such individual to the alternative punishment of transportation for life.⁶ Where one accused was mainly responsible for the murderous assault and the other accused who were his relatives joined him under his influence, it was held that the ends of justice would be met if those other accused were sentenced to transportation for life only.⁷ It is not proper that the less severe sentence should be passed when the heinousness of the crime is aggravated because several persons have conspired together to commit it and have jointly perpetrated it. The sentiment of a Judge that because it is impossible to differentiate between co-murderers and pass capital sentence on some of them, it is wrong to carry out the law and sentence seven men to death, cannot be too strongly reprobated. A Judge is wrong where he fails to sentence accused persons to death when they have deserved that punishment, and he errs grievously in yielding to such irrelevant considerations. "Judges are sworn to administer the law not as they wish it to be, but as they find it".⁸ As many of the murders can only be committed by a gang, too much leniency should not be exercised in favour of persons where participation alone makes it possible that the crime should be committed even though some of them might have no direct motive for committing the murder, and probably were only participating to oblige their friends.⁹ The Lahore High Court has taken the same view and held that where several persons join together to murder another and do murder him under such circumstances that there can be no doubt that the intention was to murder, every one of them ought to receive the sentence of death, unless there is any circumstance to distinguish one case from another.¹⁰ When a person is mercilessly beaten to death, it is no ground for not awarding the capital penalty that it is not known who inflicted the fatal blow.¹¹ The Madras and the Patna High Courts have held accordingly.¹²

The question whether more persons than one should be hanged for a single murder is one of nicety. In a case Fulton, J., said: "The murder was cruel and deliberate. All who took part in it might justly be condemned to die. But as usual in cases where many prisoners are involved, we hesitate to confirm so many sentences and try to discriminate".¹³ In a later case,¹⁴ Crump, J., stated: "As regards the sentences, I feel that the infliction of six sentences of death in one and the same case is rather apt to fail of the effect, which such sentences would otherwise have. It is possible that a wholesale penalty of this kind does not ineffectually act as a deterrent, but rather shocks the public conscience which is a thing that should be avoided at all costs. It is also usual in a case of this kind to distinguish, if possible, between the cases of accused persons where a large number have been found guilty of murder". Endorsing the above remarks, Barlee, J., added: "We cannot confirm all the six sentences of death. These sentences may be logical but I can see no object in requiring six lives for one. The object of punishment in such cases, is, firstly, to satisfy the feelings of revenge of the relations of the deceased and to prevent them from taking revenge afterwards...Secondly punishment must be deterrent".¹⁵

The mere fact, however, that it is impossible to say which of the accused actually inflicted the fatal wound is no reason at all for refraining from passing the death sentence, where the Court is satisfied that there was a common intention to murder, brutally carried out, and that all took part in the beating, the result of which was death. In this Lahore case, three persons were sentenced to be hanged for the murder of one person.¹⁶ It is followed in a subsequent case in which six persons were hanged for a single murder.¹⁷ In a Madras case four persons were sentenced to death for killing one man.¹⁸

Mental derangement.—A person was tried for murdering his two children and convicted under this section. At or about the time when the accused committed the murderous attack on his two little children, his mind was unsound, but it could not be said with any degree of certainty that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong or contrary to law. It was held that the sheer brutality of the assault in the absence of any provocation was a circumstance which would lead to the inference that the mind of the accused was in fact unhinged and far from normal. Under these circumstances, capital sentence was not imposed.¹⁹

Motive.—Where the facts proved established that the accused was not actuated by any 'baser motive', but he committed the offence of murder in the honest, though unfounded, belief that by so doing he was saving the life of, and alleviating the sufferings of others, the sentence of transportation, instead of a death sentence, was held to be the proper sentence.²⁰

Penitence.—Penitence is not a factor which may induce the Court to pass the lesser penalty.²¹

Persuasion.—A person did not inflict any injury on the deceased and it appeared that he was acting under the influence of his brother when he accompanied the latter to the place where the offence was committed. It was held that under those circumstances the extreme penalty of law should not be exacted in his case.²²

Provocation.—Where the provocation caused to the accused is very grave though not sudden the Court is justified in not inflicting sentence of death²³ and recommending the case to the Government for reduction in sentence.²⁴ Provocation, which is not sufficient to reduce an offence of murder to that of culpable homicide, may be taken into consideration, together with other circumstances, in passing the alternative sentence of transportation for life. The first wife of a tea garden cooly was unfaithful and left him. He had another wife who behaved in a similar manner. She was taken back and forgiven, but she again ran away and refused to return to her husband, who murdered her in her lover's hut. The cooly was twenty-five years old, of humble origin and limited intelligence. He confessed his guilt and stated that the action of his wife had made it impossible for him to face his relatives. It was held that these were circumstances which the Court should take into consideration and which would justify it in passing the alternative sentence of transportation for life rather than the sentence of death.²⁵ Where one of the accused did not hit any of the opposite party though he had fired and the shooting was in revenge for an insult of which deceased's brother was guilty, it was held that it was not necessary to exact the extreme penalty of death.¹

Where the deceased used highly provocative language towards the accused, a sentence of five years' rigorous imprisonment was deemed to be sufficient.² Where the fight is sudden and of a trivial origin and the accused is of young age, loses temper and inflicts the fatal injury in his anxiety to help his brother, the extreme penalty of death is not called for.³

Sex of accused.—The sex of the offender ought not to be taken into account in passing sentence, unless there are extenuating circumstances. Women who commit cold-blooded murder are generally very hard-hearted, more cruel and more daring than even males; and anybody who is acquainted with the habits, traditions and antecedents of women who commit this class of offence must be satisfied that the sentence of death is by no means a harsh sentence to pass on such women. Cases of this kind stand upon a footing different from the cases where women are led into killing their children to cover their own shame because of the cruelty of social customs and laws which their society enforces, with relentless rigour. Where, therefore, a barren woman killed another's child to get children, the Court passed a sentence of death.⁴ The existence of a young baby born to the accused since the murder, which was a cold-blooded one, was held to be no ground for passing the lesser sentence, transportation for life, when there were no extenuating circumstances.⁵ "There is no rule that a woman is protected by her sex from the death penalty. Of course, where a man and a woman are jointly charged with an offence, the Court may often take the view that the woman acted under the influence of the man, and that is always a reason for imposing a lesser sentence upon her. But if the Court comes to the conclusion that both parties are equally guilty, the fact that one of them is a woman is no ground for making a distinction in the sentence."⁶ Comparative lenity to women is a commonly accepted rule of practice though not of law, but in dealing with an atrocious crime the mere sex of the criminal should not bar the imposition of a sentence which would be considered appropriate in the case of a man.⁷ The Court sometimes takes into consideration the age of the accused when passing sentence. Where a young girl of fifteen years killed her step-son because her husband was illtreating her, the Court sentenced her to transportation for life.⁸ Where a woman murders her newly-born illegitimate child there are mitigating circumstances sufficient to reduce the appropriate penalty of death very much below a sentence of transportation for life.⁹

Oudh Rule.—In the case of a female prisoner charged with an offence punishable with death, Sessions Judges shall at the close of the trial inquire from such prisoner whether she pleads that she is or is not quick with child. If she alleges or he has reason to suppose that she is quick with child, he shall then make inquiries to ascertain whether she is or is not quick with child and report the result of his inquiries in his judgment.¹⁰

Madras Rule.—In all cases where women are convicted for the murder of their infant children, a reference should be made, through the High Court, to the Government with an expression by the Sessions Judge of his opinion as to the propriety or otherwise of reducing the sentence.¹¹

Lahore Rule.—In every case in which a sentence of transportation for life is passed on a woman for the murder of her infant child, and the sentence is not appealed against, the record of the case shall, after the expiration of the period allowed for appeal, be forwarded to the High Court for submission to Government, with a view to the consideration of the question whether any commutation or reduction of the sentence should be allowed.¹²

Superstition.—Where an illiterate young woman living in the midst of environments reminiscent only of the dark ages and where gross ignorance and superstition prevailed and throughout whose life all opportunities of receiving education and enlightenment had been denied, believed that the death of her children was the direct result of the influence of the 'evil shadow' cast upon her by another woman, her husband's brother's wife, and in this superstitious state of mind picked up the latter's child and caused its death, it was held that, under the circumstances, transportation for life was a sufficient punishment.¹³

Youth.—Youth alone in every case is not such an extenuating circumstance as would justify the imposition of the lesser penalty.¹⁴ Although the High Court cannot pass any sentence less than that of transportation for life even where the accused is rather young, the authorities who are entitled to exercise the prerogative of the Crown are not restrained from any such consideration.¹⁵ But youth should be taken into consideration with the other facts of the case.¹⁶ If in consequence of inexperience and youth the accused commits murder in vindication of a supposed wrong, the youth, in conjunction with other circumstances, may be taken into consideration in favour of the accused and the lesser of the two punishments may be awarded.¹⁷ Where there is the additional circumstance of want of motive for the crime and the probability of the accused being merely a tool in the hands of third persons¹⁸ or where there is provocation,¹⁹ the lesser penalty may be inflicted. The tender age of the accused may, by itself, be a sufficient reason for awarding the sentence of transportation for life.²⁰ Where the murder cannot be said to be wholly deliberate and cold-blooded, and where there may be a certain amount of legitimate provocation rankling, which in an immature mind might assume an exaggerated importance the capital sentence might not be the appropriate one.²¹ When murder is found to have been committed under provocation which is not such as to take the case out of this section, but which is still such as, having regard to the age of the accused and the class to which he belongs, filled him with blind passion and banished self-control, there is a fit case for awarding the lesser penalty of transportation for life.²² But in the case of a ruthless and brutal murder tender age is not a sufficient reason,²³ nor is it so where the murder is caused as a hired 303. Whoever, being under sentence of transportation for life¹, commits murder, shall be punished with death.

Punishment for murder by life convict,

COMMENT.

This section makes capital sentence compulsory in the case of a convict who commits murder while undergoing a sentence of transportation. Thus, where a person under sentence of transportation for life on a conviction for murder is found guilty of murder on a subsequent and different charge, the only sentence that can be passed on him according to this section is that of death.⁴

1. 'Being under sentence of transportation for life'.—These words indicate that the sentence of transportation must have been passed on the accused. It is immaterial whether he was already transported or not.

A sentence of transportation for life means a sentence of transportation for the whole of the remaining period of the convicted person's natural life. If a person, who has been sentenced to transportation for life and whose sentence (after he had served a part of it) has been remitted under s. 401, Criminal Procedure Code, by the Government upon conditions, commits murder after his release, he must be considered as "being under sentence of transportation for life" within this section, and the Court must pass a sentence of death upon him.⁵ The Chief Court of Sind has dissented from this view and has held that when an accused person has been convicted of murder and sentenced to transportation for life, and the remainder of that sentence has been remitted without condition by the Provincial Government under s. 401 of the Criminal Procedure Code, he can no longer be said to be under a sentence of transportation for life and therefore the provisions of this section could not apply.⁶

304. Whoever commits culpable homicide not amounting to murder, shall be punished with transportation for life, or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine, if the act by which the death is caused is done with the intention of causing death, or of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death ; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, or with fine, or with both, if the act is done with the knowledge that it is likely to cause death, but without any intention to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.

COMMENT.

This section "creates no offence, but provides the punishment for culpable homicide not amounting to murder, and draws a distinction in the penalty to be inflicted, where, an intention to kill being present, the act would have amounted to murder, but for its having fallen within one of the Exceptions to s. 300, and those cases in which the crime is culpable homicide not amounting to murder, that is to say, where there is knowledge that death will be a likely result, but intention to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death is absent".⁷ If the act of the accused falls within either of the clauses 1, 2 and 3 of s. 300 but is covered by any of the five Exceptions, it will be punishable under the first part. If the act comes under clause 4 of s. 300 but is covered by any of the Exceptions it will be punishable under the second part.⁸ The first part of this section applies where there is guilty intention and the second part applies where there is no such intention, but there is guilty knowledge.⁹ There was a sudden quarrel about cattle bell, between A and B. The quarrel resulted into sudden and unpremeditated fight. When B lifted up his stick to strike A, A gave him a blow with his kulhari, B died on the next day. It was held that though A had a right of private defence it was not within his right to use the kulhari with the force he did and which caused the death. He was held guilty under s. 300(1), and not under s. 302.¹⁰

The second part of this section is to be read with the last few words of s. 299 and has no reference to s. 300 or to the Exceptions therein, and must not be confused with culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹¹

Where the finding of the Sessions Judge was that "the accused must have known that he was likely to cause death" and the conviction was under s. 302 for an offence falling under s. 300 (4), it was held that, on the Court's finding, the accused was guilty of an offence under the second part of this section, and not under s. 302.¹²

Applicability of s. 34.—Section 34 of the Code can apply to a case under the second part of this section. Although to constitute an offence under the second part there must be no intention of causing death or such injury as the offender knew was likely to cause death, there must still be a common intention to do an act with the knowledge that it is likely to cause death though without the intention of causing death. Each of the assailants may know that the act they are jointly doing is one that is likely to cause death but have no intention of causing death, yet they may have the common intention to do that act.¹³ The Chief Court of Oudh has held that a common intention is an intention shared by the person who has caused death and by the other assailants who did not themselves cause death. If the act which caused death is neither murder nor culpable homicide because the person who dealt the blow did not have such intention as is specified under s. 299 or s. 300, but only the knowledge which is specified in either of these two sections, there is no intention which can be shared by all the assailants who did not strike the fatal blow and, therefore, s. 34 cannot apply. The knowledge referred to in ss. 299 and 300 is personal knowledge of the person who struck the blow and it is difficult to see how it can be shared by his co-assailants, but in any case s. 34 is restricted to common intention and does not embrace any knowledge.¹⁴

The Allahabad High Court has held that s. 34 cannot be made applicable to the second part of this section. Under s. 34 there must be the furtherance of the common intention, while under the second part of this section there is no question of intention.¹⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the death of the person in question.

(2) That such death was caused by the act of the accused.

(3) That the accused intended by such act to cause death; or that he intended by such act to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death; or that he knew that such act of his would be likely to cause death.

“The most important consideration upon a trial for this offence is the intention or knowledge with which the act which caused death, was done. The intention to cause death or the knowledge that death will probably be caused, is essential and is that to which the law principally looks. And it is of the utmost importance that those who may be entrusted with judicial powers should clearly understand that no conviction ought to take place, unless such intention or knowledge can from the evidence be concluded to have really existed.

“The existence of a particular evil motive such as hatred, avarice, jealousy, etc., is not necessary. It is no part of the definition of culpable homicide that the act which causes death should be a malicious act. Malice is not made a necessary ingredient. Whatever may be the motive which incites the action, and whether or not any motive whatsoever be discoverable, the question for investigation is this:—Did the accused person intend to cause death, or a bodily injury likely to end in death; or did he know that it was a probable result of his act? If such was his purpose and design, or such his knowledge,—and none of the General Exceptions of this Code are applicable,—the act is an offence within this definition, although there is no apparent motive for it. If the intention or knowledge is clearly shewn, it is needless to enquire into the motives. It must not, however, be forgotten that under certain circumstances the existence of a motive may become an important element in a chain of presumptive evidence, as tending to shew the intention of the accused person.

“It may be asked how can the existence of the requisite intention or knowledge be proved, seeing that these are internal and invisible acts of the mind? They can be ascertained only from external and visible acts. Observation and experience enable us to judge of the connection between men's conduct and their intentions. We know that a sane man does not usually commit certain acts heedlessly or unintentionally—and generally we have no difficulty in inferring from his conduct what was his real intention upon any given occasion.”²⁰

Where the case is on the border line between murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder, the accused is entitled to the benefit of any reasonable doubt and he can be convicted only under this section.²¹

Where a man receives only one blow on the head and dies, and there is no evidence to show which of the two persons attacking him gave that blow, neither of the two will be convicted under this section but both of them can be convicted of an offence under s. 325.²² But where two or more persons band themselves together for the express purpose of taking a man's life and are found guilty of murder the Court is not justified in refraining from passing a sentence of death, which would otherwise be proper, merely on the ground that it cannot find definitely which of the accused delivered the blow which is to be regarded as fatal.²³ It was found that three appellants came determined to take possession of the taur armed with clubs and in the course of the fight one of them, who was armed with an iron-shod lathi, inflicted a fatal injury on the head of the deceased and fractured his skull. It was held, under the circumstances, that the assailant who caused the fatal injury was rightly convicted under the second part of this section and his companions were rightly held guilty under s. 325, as they certainly knew that grievous hurt was likely to be inflicted and came prepared to inflict it in furtherance of the common object.²⁴ Where four accused simultaneously attacked the deceased with lathis and caused several injuries two of which proved fatal but there was no evidence to show which particular assailant caused the fatal injuries and there was no concert or pre-arranged plan to justify the application of s. 34, it was held that none of the four accused could be convicted of the offence under this section, but it could be presumed that every one of them had at least the intention of causing grievous hurt and therefore each one of them was guilty of an offence under s. 325.²⁵

The Allahabad High Court has held that when death has occurred, it is obviously unsatisfactory to find a man guilty of grievous hurt and the Legislature has taken into consideration that the intention to cause grievous hurt may be a more serious moral offence than the knowledge that death is likely to occur, by making imprisonment obligatory under s. 325 and not under the second part of this section.¹

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Calcutta Circular.—(a) Sessions Judges, in all cases in which they may convict of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, shall invariably mention in their remarks on the trial the circumstances under which the culpable homicide was held not to amount to “murder”.

(b) Sessions Judges shall invariably record their opinion whether the act by which death was caused was done with the intention of causing death, or of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, or with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death, but without any intention to cause death, or to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death. And, in cases tried by a jury, they should be careful to obtain a specific verdict on these points.²

Patna Circular.—(a) Sessions Judges, in all cases in which they may convict of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, shall invariably mention in their remarks on the trial the circumstances under which the culpable homicide was held not to amount to “murder”.

And, in cases tried by jury, they should be careful to obtain a specific verdict on these points.³

The Central Provinces Circular.—In view of the distinctive penal provisions contained in s. 304 of the Penal Code, Sessions Judges and Magistrates specially empowered will, in all cases in which they may convict the accused of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, invariably record their opinion whether the act by which the death was caused was done with the intention of causing death or of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause death; or with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death, but without any intention to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death.⁴

Committal.—Where death has resulted from a violent attack, the Magistrate must commit the accused to the Court of Session on a charge of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁵

the Judge omitted to require the jury to do this, the High Court held that the conviction was for the lighter description of the offence.⁷ In a trial on a capital charge the jury should be directed in the event of finding that the accused culpably caused the injuries which resulted in death to find with what intention he did so. If they find that his intention was to cause only such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, they should find the accused guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The general conduct of the accused at the time of committing the act the nature of the weapon used, the number and nature of the wounds inflicted are all considerations which should guide the jury in arriving at the intention of the accused.⁸

A verdict of guilty under the first part of this section read with s. 34 may not be theoretically impossible, but it is almost impossible to visualise the practical mentality that can conceive a common intention to commit culpable homicide not amounting to murder by exceeding the right of private offence. It is difficult to suppose that two or more persons, who have the right of private defence, would in real life have a sort of discussion to reach such a common intention exceeding that right. In a clear case of murder or nothing, to direct the jury that they might alternatively return a verdict of guilty under the first part of this section read with s. 34 is to give the jury an opportunity to bring in a loophole verdict thereby avoiding the necessity of returning a verdict entailing capital punishment.⁹

If an accused had knowledge necessary to justify under this section he must have known that the injury intended to be caused endangered life. Hence, in a case where the accused who stabbed the deceased with a knife in the abdomen was charged under s. 302 of the Code, the correct direction was that the accused would be guilty under s. 326 if the jury did not find the intention requisite under s. 302 or s. 304, Part I, but had knowledge that the wound inflicted was likely to endanger life.¹⁰

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, committed culpable homicide not amounting to murder, causing the death of——, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 304 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.¹¹

Punishment where provocation caused by adultery.—The Bombay High Court has observed that no higher provocation can be given than that of finding a man's wife in actual intercourse with a paramour, and death caused under such circumstances must be visited with a very light sentence. It, therefore, passed a sentence of six months' rigorous imprisonment where death was the result of provocation of this sort.¹² The Madras High Court passed a sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment in similar circumstances.¹³ Similarly, the former Chief Court of the Punjab had sentenced the accused to one year's imprisonment where he caught the deceased in the act of adultery with his married sister and struck him one blow on the head with a stick which killed him by fracturing his skull.¹⁴ The Lahore High Court passed a sentence of three months' rigorous imprisonment where the accused killed the deceased who was found lying on the same cot as his wife and who had carried on adulterous intercourse with his wife when he was in jail.¹⁵ In a similar case the Allahabad High Court imposed five years' rigorous imprisonment.¹⁶ Where the accused actually caught the deceased (his married sister) in the act of sexual intercourse with a stranger, and being enraged gave a number of blows which caused her death, it was held that under the circumstances of the case three years' rigorous imprisonment was sufficient.¹⁷ Where murder was committed in the heat of passion and on the spur of the moment, after the accused's patience had been strained by the deceased (his immoral wife) to the utmost, the sentence of five years' rigorous imprisonment was deemed sufficient.¹⁸ Where the husband suffered for a long time through the obstinacy, viciousness, and flagrant immorality of his wife whom he drowned in the river Jhelum by giving a push while bathing, it was held that the above circumstances entitled him to a lenient sentence and the Court imposed three years' rigorous imprisonment.¹⁹

Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

The Penal Code of some countries provides specially for the reduction or even the entire remission of punishment for the slaying of an adulterer taken in the act. The Indian Penal Code, like that of most other countries, makes adultery punishable as a crime. However the matter may be regarded from a moral point of view, the law forbids the husband to take vengeance with his own hands, and, if he chooses to avenge his injury himself, he does so at his peril. At the same time the amount of punishment to be imposed is discretionary, so that while it is made sufficiently severe to deter the injured husband from resort to excess in violence, it may not be made so severe as to encourage adulterers with the hope of immunity from immediate chastisement.²⁰ The Baluchi custom of killing for unchastity is no extenuation of the crime of murder and cannot be taken into consideration in the mitigation of sentence.²¹

Where the accused was found to have murdered his wife under a mistaken impression that she was unchaste, the High Court set aside the punishment of death passed upon him and sentenced him to transportation for life.²² But a mere suspicion of a wife's conduct is no extenuation of a deliberate act of murder.²³ Where the act is deliberate to get rid of a wife,²⁴ or where the husband leaves his wife for several months and subjects her to temptations and kills her lover²⁵ the extreme penalty must be inflicted.

Right of defence exceeded.—Where, in an affray respecting land, one party were the aggressors, and the other side (had the affair not ended fatally) would have been in the legal exercise of the right of defence of property and would have been entitled to the benefit of s. 104, it was held that one year's rigorous imprisonment was sufficient.¹

A crowd of five or six persons was engaged in a free fight using hatchets and lathis, and some of them were shouting that they were being robbed of property; accused N, not being in the fight himself and not knowing who were the robbers and who were the robbed, fired a gun shot at the crowd to scare them away but killed one of them. It was held that the law does not give a person the right to defend another man's person or property when he finds some unknown persons engaged in a free fight, that such an act cannot be covered by s. 79, as there was lack of good faith, that is due care and caution, Nor does such an act fall under s. 304A, which excludes culpable homicide; the person who fired a gun at a crowd must know that if the shot hit one of the crowd in a vital part of his body, he would die of the injury so caused. Such an act would fall under the second part of this section.²

Sudden quarrel.—The accused and the deceased exchanged abuses on which accused gave the deceased a single blow on the head causing fracture of the skull, and then refrained from causing any further injury. It was held that a sentence of two years' rigorous imprisonment was appropriate.³ Where there was a quarrel between the father and the son, and the latter suddenly got enraged, struck the former in the heat of passion and caused three or four injuries including one on the head which proved fatal, it was held that the offence of the accused fell under the latter part of this section.⁴ Where there was a violent altercation between a husband and wife and the husband threw a stone which killed the wife, the Court altered the sentence of death to one of transportation for life.⁵

In a quarrel between the accused's wife and his brother's wife, the latter abused the accused's daughters, whereupon the accused hit her a single violent blow with a stick which he picked up there and then. The woman died of her injury the following day. There was no feeling of enmity between the accused and the deceased. It was held that the quarrel being unpremeditated and the blow having been struck in the heat of passion, a severe sentence was not called for, and that a sentence of three years' rigorous imprisonment would meet the ends of justice.⁶ Where the deceased had used abusive and provocative language and the accused had only struck one blow, a sentence of three years' rigorous imprisonment was held to be sufficient.⁷

The deceased cut off branches from a tree apparently belonging to the accused who objected. An altercation ensued in which the accused struck the deceased a blow on the head with an iron-bound lathi. It was held that though the accused had a right to prevent the deceased from taking away the branches of the tree, he had no justification for hitting the deceased on the head as he did and was sentenced to two years' imprisonment.⁸

304A. Whoever causes the death of any person by doing any rash or negligent act¹ not amounting to culpable homicide² shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Causing death by negligence.

COMMENT.

This section deals with homicide by negligence.

Object.—The Code as it originally stood contained no adequate provision for the punishment of what English law called manslaughter by negligence. In the draft Code there was a section which punished this offence, but by some accident it had been omitted from the Code when it was passed into law. The present section inserted by Act XXVII of 1870, s. 12, supplied the omission.

Scope.—The provisions of this section seem to apply to cases where there is no intention to cause death and no knowledge that the act done in all probability would cause death.⁹ It only applies to such acts as are rash and negligent and are directly the cause of death of another person. It must be read along with ss. 336, 337 and 338. All these sections are confined in their operation to acts done without any criminal intent, apart from the rashness or negligence which is their essential ingredient.¹⁰

This section does not apply to a case in which there has been the voluntary commission of an offence against the person. If a man intentionally commits such an offence, and consequences beyond his immediate purpose result, it is for the Court to determine how far he can be held to have the knowledge that he was likely by such act to cause the actual result. If such knowledge can be imputed, the result is not to be attributed to mere rashness; if it cannot be imputed, still the wilful offence does not take the character of rashness, because its consequences have been unfortunate. Acts, probably or possibly, involving danger to others, but which in themselves are not offences, may be offences under ss. 336, 337, 338 or 304A, if done without due care to guard against the dangerous consequences. Acts which are offences in themselves must be judged with regard to the knowledge, or means of knowledge, of the offender, and placed in their appropriate place in the class of offences of the same character.¹¹ Where the act is in its nature criminal, this section has no application.¹²

This section does not apply to cases where the death has arisen, not from the negligent or rash mode of doing the act, but from some result supervening upon the act which would not have been anticipated.¹³

1. 'Rash or negligent act.'—A rash act is primarily an overhasty act, and is thus opposed to a deliberate act, but it also includes an act which, though it may be said to be deliberate, is yet done without due deliberation and caution.¹⁴

Criminal rashness "is hazarding a dangerous or wanton act with the knowledge that it is so, and that it may cause injury, but without intention to cause injury, or knowledge that it will probably be caused. The criminality lies in running the risk of doing such an act with recklessness or indifference as to the consequences. Criminal negligence is the gross and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care and precaution to guard against injury either to the public generally or to an individual in particular, which, having regard to all the circumstances out of which the charge has arisen, it was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted."¹⁵ Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do.¹⁶ In order to establish criminal liability the facts must be such that the negligence of the accused goes beyond a mere matter of compensation between subjects and shows such disregard for the life and safety of others as to amount to a crime against the State and conduct deserving punishment.¹⁷

"Culpable rashness is acting with the consciousness that the mischievous and illegal consequences may follow, but with the hope that they will not, and often with the belief that the actor has taken sufficient precautions to prevent their happening. The imputability arises from acting despite the consciousness (luxuria). Culpable negligence is acting without the consciousness that the illegal and mischievous effect will follow, but in circumstances which show that the actor has not exercised the caution incumbent upon him, and that if he had he would have had the consciousness. The imputability arises from the neglect of the civic duty of circumspection. It is manifest that personal injury, consciously and intentionally caused, cannot fall within either of these categories, which are wholly inapplicable to the case of an act or series of acts, themselves intended, which are the direct producers of death. To say that because, in the opinion of the operator, the sufferer could have borne a little more without death following, the act amounts merely to rashness because he has carried the experiment too far, results from an obvious and dangerous misconception...It is clear, however, that if the words 'not amounting to culpable homicide' are a part of the definition, the offence defined by this section consists of the rash or negligent act not falling under that category, as much as of its fulfilling the positive requirement of being the cause of death."¹⁸

"Manslaughter by negligence occurs when a person is doing anything dangerous in itself, or has charge of anything dangerous in itself, and conducts himself in regard to it in such a careless manner that the jury feel that he is guilty of culpable negligence, and ought to be punished...Supposing a man performed a surgical operation, whether from losing his head, or from forgetfulness, or from some other reason, omitted to do something he ought to have done, or did something he ought not to have done, in such a case there would be negligence. But if there was only the kind of forgetfulness which is common to everybody, or if there was a slight want of skill, any injury which resulted might furnish a ground for claiming civil damages but it would be wrong to proceed against a man criminally in respect of such injury.

But if a surgeon was engaged in attending a woman during her confinement, and went to the engagement drunk, and through his drunkenness neglected his duty, and the woman's life was in consequence sacrificed, there would be culpable negligence of a grave kind. It is not given to everyone to be a skilful surgeon, but it is given to everyone to keep sober when such a duty has to be performed."¹⁹

The words "rashly and negligently" are distinguishable and one is exclusive of the other. The same act cannot be rash as well as negligent.²⁰

To render a person liable for neglect of duty there must be such a degree of culpability as to amount to gross negligence on his part. It is not every little trip or mistake that will make him so liable.²¹ The distinction between the negligence which is sufficient ground for a civil action and the higher degree which is necessary in criminal proceedings is sharply insisted on in several cases.²²

A person driving a motor car is under a duty to control that car; he is prima facie guilty of negligence if the car leaves the road and dashes along into a tree and it is for the person driving the car to explain the circumstances under which the car came to leave the road. Those circumstances may be beyond control, and may exculpate him, but in the absence of such circumstances, the fact that the car left the road is evidence of negligence on the part of the driver.²³ The mere velocity of a vehicle is not the only criterion of rash and negligent driving, which may also consist in taking, while driving, risks which by the exercise of a little diligence could be avoided. Driving a car recklessly until it comes so close to a pedestrian that it becomes impossible to save the collision cannot be characterised as rash and negligent driving. As between a pedestrian and a driver of a motor vehicle, the responsibility of the latter is greater as the duty to use care increases in proportion to the danger involved in dealing with the instrument that a person brings for his own purpose in close proximity to others. Ordinarily pedestrians using the road are not exempt from the duty to take care of themselves, but negligence, if any, on the part of a pedestrian cannot excuse negligence on the part of a driver of a motor car.²⁴

Death must result from rash or negligent act.—"Death should have been the direct result of a rash and negligent act of the accused and that act must have been the proximate and efficient cause without the intervention of another's negligence. It must have been the causa causans; it is not enough that it may have been the causa sine qua non."²⁵ The rash or negligent act means the act which is the immediate cause of death and not any act or omission which can at most be said to be a remote cause of death.¹ In cases falling under this section it is dangerous to attempt to distinguish between the approximate and ultimate cause of death due to a rash and negligent act.² Where a person using a road was accidentally killed in consequence of it being out of repair through neglect of trustees, appointed for the purpose of repairing the roads, to contract for repairing it, it was held that they were not chargeable with manslaughter.³ If the driver of a carriage be racing with another carriage, and from being unable to pull up his horses in time the first mentioned carriage is upset, and a person thrown off it and killed, this is manslaughter in the driver of that carriage.⁴ Death caused by negligence is to be treated in law as death caused by any other form of negligence.⁵

into which neither intention nor knowledge...enters. For the rash or negligent act which is declared to be a crime is one 'not amounting to culpable homicide', and it must therefore be taken that intentionally or knowingly inflicted violence, directly and wilfully caused, is excluded. Section 304A does not say every unjustifiable or inexcusable act of killing not hereinbefore mentioned shall be punishable under the provisions of this section, but it specifically and in terms limits itself to those rash or negligent acts which cause death but fall short of culpable homicide of either description. According to English law, offences of this kind would come within the category of manslaughter, but the authors of our Penal Code appear to have thought it more convenient to give them a separate status in a section to themselves, with a narrower range of punishment proportioned to their culpability. It appears to me impossible to hold that cases of direct violence, wilfully inflicted, can be regarded as either rash or negligent acts. There may be in the act an absence of intention to kill, to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, or of knowledge that death will be the most probable result, or even of intention to cause grievous hurt, or of knowledge that grievous hurt is likely to be caused. But the inference seems irresistible that hurt at the very least must be presumed to have been intended, or to have been known to be likely to be caused. If such intention or knowledge is present, it is a misapplication of terms to say that the act itself, which is the real test of the criminality, amounts to no more than rashness or negligence."⁶ The accused, while engaged in a verbal wrangle with his wife, struck her a blow on the left side with great force, the result of which was that she vomited and bled from the nose, and within little more than an hour died. Upon the post-mortem examination it was found that her "spleen was badly ruptured, almost torn across; death was caused by rupture of the spleen." There were no signs of disease of the spleen, though it was a little enlarged. The Sessions Judge convicted him under this section, but the High Court altered the conviction to one under s. 325 on the ground that the blow was wilfully and consciously given to the deceased by the accused and the consequences that resulted from it could not change a wilful and conscious act into a rash or negligent one and it was found that the accused neither intended to kill nor to cause bodily injury likely to cause death and that he had not the knowledge that death would be the probable result.⁷

Death caused by person practising surgery or medicine.—Where a person practising medicine or surgery, whether licensed or unlicensed, is guilty of gross negligence, or criminal inattention, in the course of his employment, and in consequence of such negligence or inattention death ensues, it is manslaughter, but if there is no gross negligence it is not.⁸ Where a person acting as a medical man, whether licensed or unlicensed, administers to a patient a poisonous medicine without any intent of doing any bodily harm but with an intent to prevent or cure a disease and it kills the patient, he is guilty of an offence under this section.⁹

The duty of a medical man, who undertakes the treatment of a patient, is to use a fair and reasonable standard of care and competence. Before a medical man can be held criminally responsible for the death of his patient, the prosecution must prove all matters necessary to establish civil liability, except pecuniary loss, and in addition must prove negligence or incompetence on his part which went beyond a mere matter of compensation between subjects and showed such disregard for the life and safety of others as to amount to a crime against the State.¹⁰ Where a doctor prepared an injection by dissolving some powder in water which he gave to fifty-seven children of whom five died and others were made ill, it was held that negligence, to be criminal, must be gross and that the only negligence on which reliance could be placed being the single act of dissolving the powder in water, a criminal degree of negligence had not been proved merely because too strong a mixture had once been dispensed and a number of children made gravely ill.¹¹

Contributory negligence.—The doctrine of contributory negligence does not apply to criminal liability where the death of a person is caused partly by the negligence of the accused and partly by his own negligence. The doctrine of contributory negligence has no place in an indictment of criminal negligence.¹² Where a person is charged with the offence of causing loss of life by a negligent omission it is not open to him to rely on the plea of contributory negligence which is distinctly recognized in the law of torts but finds no place in an indictment for criminal negligence. In such a case the question is what was the proximate cause of the accident.¹³

If the accused is charged with contributing to the death of the deceased by his negligence, it matters not whether he was deaf, or drunk, or negligent, or in part contributed to his own death.¹⁴ A driver cannot absolve himself from the consequences of rash driving by merely showing that the person to whom or to whose property he has caused injury was himself negligent.¹⁵ If the negligent act or omission of a motor driver was the proximate and efficient cause of death, the fact that the deceased was himself negligent and so contributed to the accident or other circumstances by which the death was occasioned, does not afford therefore a defence to a charge under this section.¹⁶

Rash or negligent act.—Where a railway official, after being instructed to move some trucks down an incline uncoupled and singly, disobeyed the instruction and lost control over them, and a coolie in trying to stop the trucks fell under the wheels and was killed;¹⁷ where an engine-driver failed to sound his whistle before starting the engine, and the engine having been put in motion caused a boy, who was painting a wagon, on the line, injury, which resulted in his death;¹⁸ where the accused while out shooting with the deceased in a jungle separate from him, seeing something move in the jungle but without waiting to see what it was, fired and shot the deceased;¹⁹ where the accused cut out the piles of a person with an ordinary knife and, from the profuse bleeding, the person died;²⁰ where the accused struck at a man carrying a child and the blow fell on the child and killed it;²¹ where the accused received poison from her paramour to administer it to her husband as a charm and administered it with the result that death ensued, but she did not know that the substance given to her was noxious until she had seen its effects;²² where the accused administered to her husband a deadly poison (arsenious oxide) believing it to be a love potion in order to stimulate his affection for her, and the husband died from the effects of the poison;²³ where the accused administered a love potion (found to be aconite) to her husband, mother-in-law, and brother-in-law, thinking that it was some charm to procure their love as they were maltreating her because she was carrying on an intrigue with a close neighbour, and her husband and mother-in-law died;²⁴ where the accused received a powder from an enemy of her relative, took no precaution to ascertain whether it was noxious, and mixed it with food believing that by doing so she would become rich, but four of the persons who ate the food died;²⁵ where the lessee of a ferry allowed an unsound boat to be used, and in consequence of its unsoundness, the boat sank while crossing the river and some of the persons in it were drowned;¹ where the accused being absorbed in an attempt to witness the preparations for a festival drove his cart on one side of the road regardless of the persons standing on that part of the road, and in so doing drove over and killed a child;² where the accused and the deceased were standing on the parapet of a deep well, and an altercation having arisen between them, the accused struck the deceased on the head with a club and the deceased lost his balance, fell into the well, and was drowned;³ where the accused sent two boxes containing fireworks to a railway company falsely declaring them to contain iron locks, with the result that in loading one of the boxes exploded killing one coolie, injuring another, and damaging the railway wagon in which it was being placed;⁴ where the accused had sexual intercourse with his child wife with such violence as to rupture the vagina and destroy the partition between the vagina and the rectum and the girl died;⁵ where the accused kicked his neighbour's boy who fell down and died;⁶ where the accused whose duty was to make a periodical inspection of certain boilers in order to see that they were in a fit condition to be worked failed to carry out his duty of inspecting the boilers from time to time and a boiler exploded and caused loss of life and injury to person;⁷ where the accused drove a motor bus on the wrong side of the road and neglected to blow his horn while passing by a stationary tram-car coming from the opposite direction and knocked down a boy of fourteen years, who had just got down from the rear of the tram-car, and he died of fracture of the skull;⁸ and where an engine-driver, while taking his engine to a water-column drove it with speed and failed to stop it in time and it collided with another engine standing at a short distance killing one man and injuring another,⁹ it was held in all those cases that the acts of the accused were either rash or negligent.

The accused had been in charge of a police-station, the vicinity of which had been much troubled by thieves. On one occasion a thief had fired at the accused. It having been reported to the accused that three thieves were prowling about, he, with two other men, went out to patrol. They saw a man crouching under a tree, and thinking he must be a thief, the accused fired at him, and killed him. The man proved to be a coolie. It was held that the accused was guilty of a most rash act.¹⁰ Where, by the bullet fired by the one or other of two accused persons who were practising at target shooting at a place near which was a public road which the accused would have noticed if they had used the least circumspection, a man was wounded resulting in his death, it was held that both the accused were guilty of an offence under this section, and that in such a case the one whose bullet struck the deceased and caused death could not be held to be the only principal offender under it, and the other whose shot did not strike the deceased, his abettor, under s. 114.¹¹ This case follows an English case the facts of which are similar. A, B and C went into a field in proximity to certain roads and houses, taking with them a rifle which would be deadly at a mile, for the purpose of practising firing with it. B placed a board, which was handed to him by A, in the presence of C, in a tree in the field as a target. All three fired shots directed at the board so placed, from a distance of about 100 yards. No precautions of any kind were taken to prevent danger from such firing. One of the shots thus fired by one, though it was not proved by which one of them, killed a boy in a tree in a garden near the field, at a spot 393 yards distant from the firing point. A, B and C were all found guilty by a jury of manslaughter. It was held by the Court that A, B and C had been guilty of a breach of duty in firing at the spot in question, without taking proper precautions to prevent injury to others, and were rightly convicted of manslaughter.¹²

Where an assistant station-master on duty at a station gave the "line clear" on his own responsibility on a foggy night knowing that another train was standing at a particular point and the train which was allowed to pass came into collision with the standing train, it was held that the granting of "line clear" under the circumstances was in itself a rash and negligent act which rendered him amenable to punishment.¹³ An unqualified person who was in charge of a dispensary had to make up a quantity of quinine mixture for cases of fever. He went to a cupboard where non-poisonous medicines were supposed to be kept and took therefrom a bottle with an outside wrapper marked 'poison.' This wrapper he tore off and threw away. The bottle itself was labelled 'strychnine hydrochloride'; but, without regarding this, and apparently because there was a resemblance between this bottle and another in which quinine hydrochloride was kept, he made up the entire contents of the bottle as if it had been quinine. The result was that seven patients died. It was held that he was guilty under this section.¹⁴ The accused, a girl of seventeen, who happened to be carrying her infant daughter tied on her back, having been exasperated at an altercation which she had with her husband, attempted to commit suicide by jumping into a well. She was found alive in the well next day but her child was drowned. The trial Judge convicted her of an attempt to commit suicide and also of the murder of her infant child, under ss. 309 and 302. It was held that the offence which she had committed was not murder, but causing death by negligent omission, i.e., omission to put the child down before jumping into the well.¹⁵ Under somewhat similar facts, the Allahabad High Court held, distinguishing this case, that the woman was guilty of culpable homicide.¹⁶ The accused, a girl of twenty-years, who was turned out of her house by her husband, lived with her lover and had a child by him. She was later sent for by the panchas of her caste, who proposed to take her back into her caste, but asked her to leave the child with her lover. At the meeting of the panchas, where the accused had the child in her arms, she threw herself with the child into a well desperately in a fit of frenzy alarmed at the prospect of separation from the child. The child died, but the accused was rescued. It was held that she was guilty of offences under this section and s. 309.¹⁷ Accused, who was driving a lorry, seeing two bullock-carts coming towards him in the middle of the road, blew his horn with the result that one of the cart-drivers swung his cart to the wrong side of the road. Accused thereupon swerved off to the right so far as to strike a tree on the right-hand side, the lorry overturning and killing one passenger and injuring several others. There was no evidence that the negligent act of the cart-driver was so sudden that it was impossible for the accused to avoid the accident if he had had his lorry under proper control. It was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁸ The accused, knowing that a pistol was loaded, was trying to unload it and while doing so, acted so negligently that the pistol went off and as a result the complainant's son was killed. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section.¹⁹ A Sub-Inspector of Police while pursuing a party of gamblers fired four shots in the air, but a person was injured and died immediately. The revolver which the Sub-Inspector used was a powerful weapon having range of one hundred yards. He fired the first shot from a distance of forty-nine cubits and the last shot thirty-four cubits from the crowd. The four shots were fired in succession while running and the surface of the ground where he ran was not level. It was held that if the Sub-Inspector had only taken sufficient care and caution he would not have fired the four shots, while running, even into the air from such a short distance as forty-nine and thirty-four cubits, seeing that the ground was uneven and that in case he slipped the bullets, which he discharged, might hit one of the crowd. His overhastiness consisted in running on an uneven ground and firing four shots in rapid succession. He was held guilty under this section.²⁰

A was driving a lorry at the speed of about twenty miles an hour when he was passed on his right side by another lorry going fast, which went on to the kacha part of the road, raised a great cloud of dust which completely blinded the driver and hid the road from him. Instead of stopping he proceeded further with the result that as he could not see the road he drove his lorry on the right side of the road instead of the left and collided with another lorry whereby several persons were injured and received grievous hurt and one died. It was held that A was guilty of a rash and negligent act.²¹ The Court observed that "when there is heavy vehicular traffic on the road and the road is invisible in a cloud of dust, as so frequently happens in this province in dry weather when a car passes which goes in the katcha part of the road, it ought to be clearly recognized that it is the duty of all motorists under these conditions to stop their cars. To continue driving must obviously be dangerous when it is impossible to see anything at all in the neighbourhood."²² The accused, driving an over-loaded lorry, was signalled by a Sub-Inspector of Police to stop but he refused to do so and drove on at an excessive speed of about fifty miles an hour wishing to escape the chase by the Sub-Inspector. During the chase a small girl tried to cross the road and was knocked down and died. It was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.²³

Acts neither rash nor negligent but intentional.—Where the accused gave the deceased a push which caused him to fall, and in such fall he broke his toe, and on the fifth day died of tetanus, this section was held not to apply. The High Court remarked that it was simply a case of using criminal force.²⁴ Where the accused threw his stick at the deceased with such force that it hit the deceased on the head with the point, and made a punctured wound which caused the death of the deceased, it was held that he had not committed an offence under this section, because the injury was intentionally caused to the deceased. He was, therefore, held guilty of causing hurt.²⁵ Where there was medical evidence to show that milk had been administered to a child in such quantities as to kill it, but there was no evidence to show that the milk was administered by the orders of the mother, or that she knew the quantity that was being administered, it was held that there was no evidence for a conviction under this section.¹ The accused was watching his field one dark night. Hearing a noise in the field he shouted, whereupon a thief ran out of it whom he followed and struck with a stick. The thief fell down, and the accused caught him and took him to a Zemindar's house. The thief became insensible there, and subsequently died from the effects of the blow which the accused had given him. It was held that he could not be convicted of an offence under this section.² Over-loading of a lorry may be an offence under the Motor Vehicles Act, but it cannot be regarded as a rash and negligent act within the meaning of this section.³ Similarly the overcrowding of a boat which capsized owing to strong wind was held to be no offence under this section.⁴ Accused was driving a motor lorry, which collided with another lorry coming in the opposite direction, with the result that a passenger on the accused's lorry was thrown out and died of the injuries. At that time another lorry was proceeding in front of the accused's lorry and a car had just passed the place; consequently a cloud of dust had gathered and visibility was very dim. The finding on the evidence was that the accused was driving too fast, considering the lack of visibility and that this act of driving too fast was rash and negligent. There was no finding that the accused was responsible for the collision. It was held that the conviction under this section could not stand.⁵

The accused's wife, eight or nine years of age, was brought by her father to his house for the purpose of being left there. At night the accused and his wife went inside the house; the fathers of both remaining outside in the verandah. After midnight the girl left the house with the intention of going home to her father's house, got into a canoe, which sank, and left her in the water, from which she was rescued by the accused's father, and brought back to the house by the accused. The accused, having pulled her into the house, kicked her on the back with his bare foot, from which kick the girl fell down and died. The Sessions Judge convicted the accused under this section. But the High Court set aside the conviction and convicted him of culpable homicide, observing: "To kick a girl of tender age with such force as to produce rupture of the abdomen in a healthy subject, appears to us to be an act of such a character that no reasonable man could be ignorant of the likelihood of its causing death."⁶ Where the accused kicked a person on his stomach and struck him with a piece of stone on his head and back and that person died ten days after receiving the injuries, it was held that the section was not applicable to a case where injuries were inflicted neither rashly nor negligently but intentionally and designedly.⁷

Where the accused, the head-man of a village, quietly stood in a corner, looking at a performance, while holding a gun which was loaded and cocked. One of the actors of the performance who was playing the part of a drunken dacoit made an unprovoked assault on the accused to amuse the audience and a struggle ensued in the course of which the gun went off and killed the actor. It was held that the accused was not guilty of causing death by negligence.⁸

Too remote consequences.—B, an assistant station-master at a station G, had, in anticipation of receiving a line clear and caution message, and against rules written out in the prescribed form book a conditional message to the effect that on the arrival at G of a down train then due from a station S, the line would be clear for a certain up train at G to start for S. The guard of the latter train thereafter, without the knowledge of B and also against rules, entered the station-master's room in his absence, tore this imperfect certificate from out of the book and without reading it, as he ought to have done, signed and passed it on to the driver, and gave the signal for the train to start, but without taking the permission of the station-master as the rules required. The driver also, without examining the certificate, started the train and a collision took place in which several persons including the driver were killed. B and the guard were both convicted under this section. It was held that B was not liable; the consequences were too remote to have been caused by B's writing out the certificate in disobedience of the rule.⁹ Where the accused, driving a motor-car at night, entered a road which being under repairs was closed to traffic and ran over and killed two coolies who were sleeping on the road with their bodies completely covered up except for their faces, it was held that the accused was not guilty of causing death by a rash and negligent act as it could not be said that he should have looked out for persons making such an abnormal use of the road.¹⁰ Where the accused kept a bottle of the "Atlas Tree Killer" in his farm-shed and two of his farm servants drank the stuff thinking it to be arrack and died in consequence, it was held that the accused could not be prosecuted under this section.¹¹

Mistake of fact.—Ghost.—Where a person believing in good faith that the object of his assault was not a human being but a ghost, caused fatal injuries on another which resulted in the death of the latter, it was held that in view of the provisions of s. 79 of the Penal Code, the accused was not guilty of an offence under this section.¹² Where the accused entertained a belief that a stooping child whom he caught sight of in the early gloaming was a spirit or demon, the child being in a place which the accused and his fellow villagers deemed to be haunted, and acting on this belief caused the death of the child by blows he inflicted before he discovered his mistake, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section.¹³

English cases.—Gross negligence.—Where the defendant came to town in a chaise, and before he got out of it, he fired his pistols, which by accident killed a woman;¹⁴ where a workman threw down a piece of timber crying aloud 'stand clear' and was heard by all labourers but one on whom it fell and killed him;¹⁵ where a man turned out a horse known to be vicious on a common across which were public footpaths and he kicked a child who died;¹⁶ where the accused being employed to drive a cart sat in the inside instead of attending at the horse's head and that cart went over a child who was gathering up flowers on the road;¹⁷ where an unskilled practitioner prescribed dangerous medicines of which he was ignorant;¹⁸ where a man pointed a gun at another person without previously examining whether it was loaded or not, and it accidentally went off and killed that person;¹⁹ and where a lad, as a frolic, took the trap-stick out of the front part of a cart, in consequence of which it was upset, and the cartman was killed,²⁰ it was held that the accused were guilty of gross negligence.

No gross negligence.—The accused was an attendant at a lunatic asylum. Being in charge of a lunatic, who was bathing, he turned on hot water through mistake into the bath, and thereby scalded him to death. It was found that the lunatic was a man capable of getting out by himself and of understanding what was said to him and that he was told to get out. It was held that he was not guilty of gross negligence.²¹ The negligent act which causes death should be that of the party charged. Where it was the duty of the accused to attend a steam-engine but he had stopped it and gone away and, during his absence, a person came to the spot, and put it in motion and, being unskilled, was not able to stop it again, and a person was killed in consequence of its being in motion, it was held that the death was not the consequence of the accused's act.²² The negligence of the accused, however gross, will not render him responsible for a death which his diligence would not have averted.²³ The accused was indicted for the manslaughter of a passenger in a train of which he was in charge as guard. The accused had directed the train to be separated on an incline, whereby a portion of the train ran backwards and collided with another train, causing the death of many of the passengers. It was held that in order to convict the accused he must be found guilty of 'gross negligence' or 'reckless negligent conduct' and that mere intellectual defect or mistake of judgment, without wilful disobedience, as to a traffic regulation, would not create criminal liability.²⁴

On an indictment for the murder of an aged and infirm woman, by confining her against her will, and not providing her with meat, drink, clothing, firing, medicines, and other necessaries, and not allowing her the enjoyment of open air, in breach of an alleged duty, Patterson, J., in his charge to the jury, said: "If the prisoner was guilty of wilful neglect, so gross and wilful that you are satisfied he must have contemplated the death of Mrs. Warner, then he will be guilty of murder. If, however, you think only that he was so careless, that her death was occasioned by his negligence, though he did not contemplate it, he will be guilty of manslaughter."²⁵

Where it was the duty of the accused as ground bailiff of a mine to cause the mine to be properly ventilated by causing air headings to be put up where necessary, and by reason of this omission another person was killed by an explosion of fire damp, it was held that the accused was guilty of manslaughter by negligence.¹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the death of the person in question.

(2) That the accused caused such death.

(3) That such act of the accused was rash or negligent, although it did not amount to culpable homicide.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

Central Provinces Circular.—Section 304A of the Penal Code is not to be applied to cases in which there is voluntary commission of an offence against the person. The Courts should be guided by the following explanation taken from the judgment of the Madras High Court in the case of Nidamarti Nagabhushanam, 7 Madras High Court Reports 119, of the terms 'rashness' and 'negligence' as used in that section:—* * * *

It may be added that in cases in which there has been an intention to cause bodily injury, and the offence does not amount to culpable homicide, the person by whom death has been caused should be punished for causing either hurt or grievous hurt, according as his intention and the nature of the injuries inflicted bring the case within the definition of one or the other offence.²

Direction to jury.—Where an accused was charged with culpable homicide and the evidence showed that the deceased had an enlarged spleen, and that his death was caused by rupture of the spleen occasioned by blows inflicted by the accused on the body of the deceased, it was held that it was not sufficient in order to find the accused guilty of a rash act under this section, that the jury should be satisfied only of the prevalence of the disease of enlargement of the spleen in the district, and infer therefrom criminal rashness in beating the deceased; but that they should also be satisfied that the accused was aware of the prevalence of such disease in the district, and also aware of the risk to life involved in striking a person afflicted with that disease.³

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, caused the death of——by doing a rash or negligent act not amounting to homicide, to wit——, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 304A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or cognizance of Court of Session).

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

Punishment.—The mere fact that a human life is lost by negligent driving of a car does not justify the Court in passing a deterrent sentence, if the lost life could not have been reasonably anticipated by the accused. In estimating the sentence passed on the accused in a case of causing death by negligence the Court has to consider whether the negligent act which has occasioned the death shows callousness on his part as regards the risk to which he was exposing other persons. The severity of the sentence must depend to a great extent on the degree of callousness which is present in the conduct of the accused. It is no part of the duty of Courts to punish with savage sentences every motorist who has the misfortune to have an accident, which results in a loss of human life, even though the accident be due to an error of judgment on the part of the driver. The circumstances of each case must be considered in imposing sentence.⁴

305. If any person under eighteen years of age, any insane person, any delirious person, any idiot, or any person in a state of intoxication commits suicide, whoever abets the commission of such suicide shall be punished with death or transportation for life, or imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Abetment of suicide of child or insane person.

COMMENT.

Object.—This and the following sections have been inserted because the ordinary law of abetment is inapplicable. They apply when suicide is in fact committed.

'Suicide' is self-destruction by a person.

The Law Commissioners observe: "It seems to us that the rule would fall to be applied under these clauses chiefly in such a case as this, where a person legally bound to take care of the person of another has by an illegal omission of his duty intentionally given him the opportunity, or permitted him to obtain the means of killing himself. It would apply also, we conceive, in the case of a person seeing another preparing to destroy himself, say by hanging, and allowing him to accomplish his purpose without any attempt to prevent him, if, as may be expected, the law of procedure makes it a common duty incumbent upon all men to assist in preventing offences about to be committed in their presence. The intention here would be inferrible from the circumstances. In the former case collateral proof of the intention would be requisite. But we apprehend that it is active aid which is principally intended in these clauses, and to which the higher penalties are meant to be applied."⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the commission of suicide by a person.

(2) That the person who committed suicide was under eighteen years of age, or was insane, or delirious, or an idiot, or intoxicated.

(3) That the accused abetted the commission of such suicide.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, abetted the commission of suicide by AB, a person in a state of intoxication (specify the state), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 305 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

306. If any person commits suicide, whoever abets¹ the commission of such suicide, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

Abetment of suicide is punishable under this section and attempt to commit suicide under s. 309.

Abetment of suicide is confined to the case of persons who aid and abet the commission of suicide by the hand of the person himself who commits the suicide. When another person, at the request of, or with the consent of, the suicider, has killed that person, he is guilty of homicide by consent, which is one of the forms of culpable homicide.⁶

1. 'Abets.'—See s. 108, supra.

CASES.

Suttee.—Three accused persons instigated a boy to light the pile of a suttee while another induced the woman to return to the pile after she had once retired from it, and she was immolated. The three persons were convicted of abetting culpable homicide, and the boy and other person, of abetting suicide.⁷ Where, in the presence of the accused, a woman prepared to commit suicide, and they followed her to the pyre and stood by her, her stepsons crying "Ram Ram", and one of the accused admitted that he told the woman to say "Ram Ram", and she would become suttee, it was held that those facts were sufficient to prove the active connivance of the accused, and to justify the inference that they had engaged with her in a conspiracy for the commission of the suttee.⁸ One R having died, his widow declared her intention to be a suttee. The accused sent word to the police, but before their arrival they took the body to the cremating place. The evidence was that the deceased having shown certain miracles they were overawed by her threats to curse them and did what she ordered them to do. They prepared the funeral pyre, placed her husband's body over it, and did not use any force to prevent her from sitting on the pyre and supplied her with ghee which she poured over the pyre and herself. It was held that the accused were guilty of abetment of suicide.⁹ Where a Hindu woman was burnt in the act of becoming suttee, those who assisted her in making her toilet, those who held up the screen for her, took her ornaments, supervised the cutting of her nails and the dyeing of her feet, prepared the pyre on which she seated herself and put the corpse upon the pyre were all held guilty of abetment of suicide. The Court observed that it was no defence to say that the abettors were in fact expecting a miracle and did not anticipate that the pyre would be ignited by human agency. The method of ignition of the fire whether miraculous, whether self-applied, or whether applied by others was immaterial."¹⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the commission of suicide by a person.

(2) That the accused abetted the commission thereof (vide s. 107).

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by the Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That on or about the—day of—, at—, one AB committed suicide, and that you abetted its commission by—(specify the act), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 306 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

307. Whoever does any act with such intention or knowledge,¹ and under such circumstances² that, if he by that act caused death, he would be guilty of murder, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if hurt is caused to any person by such act, the offender shall be liable either to transportation for life, or to such punishment as is hereinbefore mentioned.

When any person offending under this section is under sentence of transportation for life, he may, if hurt is caused, be punished with death.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A shoots at Z with intention to kill him, under such circumstances that, if death ensued, A would be guilty of murder. A is liable to punishment under this section.

(b) A with the intention of causing the death of a child of tender years exposes it in a desert place. A has committed the offence defined by this section, though the death of the child does not ensue.

(c) A, intending to murder Z, buys a gun and loads it. A has not yet committed the offence. A fires the gun at Z. He has committed the offence defined in this section, and, if by such firing he wounds Z, he is liable to the punishment provided by the latter part of the first paragraph of this section.

(d) A, intending to murder Z, by poison, purchases poison and mixes the same with food which remains in A's keeping; A has not yet committed the offence defined in this section. A places the food on Z's table or delivers it to Z's servants to place it on Z's table. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

COMMENT.

An attempt to commit a crime is an act done with intent to commit that crime, and forming part of a series of acts which would constitute its actual commission if it were not interrupted.¹¹

The authors of the Code say :—“These clauses appear to us absolutely necessary to the completeness of the Code. We have provided, under the head of bodily hurt, for cases in which hurt is inflicted in an attempt to murder; under the head of assault, for assaults committed in attempting to murder; under the head of criminal trespass, for some criminal trespasses committed in order to murder. But there will still remain many atrocious and deliberate attempts to murder which are not trespasses, which are not assaults, and which cause no hurt. A, for example, digs a pit in his garden, and conceals the mouth of it, intending that Z may fall in and perish there. Here A has committed no trespass, for the ground is his own, and no assault, for he has applied no force to Z. He may not have caused bodily hurt, for Z may have received a timely caution, or may not have gone near the pit; but A's crime is evidently one which ought to be punished as severely as if he had laid hands on Z with the intention of cutting his throat.

¹⁰ Vidyasagar Pandey, (1928) 8 Pat. 74.

¹¹ Stephen's Digest of Crim. Law, Art. 50.

"Again, A sets poisoned food before Z. Here A may have committed no trespass, for the food may be his own; and if so, he violates no right of property by mixing arsenic with it. He commits no assault, for he means the taking of the food to be Z's voluntary act. If Z does not swallow enough of the poisoned food to disorder him. A causes no bodily hurt; yet it is plain that A has been guilty of a crime of a most atrocious description.

"Similar attempts may be made to commit voluntary culpable homicide in any of the three mitigated forms. A, for example, is excited to violent passion by Z, and fires a pistol intending to kill Z. If the shot proves fatal, A will be guilty of manslaughter; and he surely ought not to be exempted from all punishment if the ball only grazes the intended victim.

"It is to meet cases of this description that clauses 308 and 309 [sections 307 and 308] are intended."¹²

Scope.—The intention or knowledge which is necessary to constitute murder may exist, combined with an act which falls short of the complete commission of that offence. The murderer may do an act towards the commission of the murder, but may involuntarily fail or be intercepted or prevented from consummating the crime. This and the following section seem to apply to attempts to murder, in which there has been not merely a commencement of an execution of the purpose, but something little short of a complete execution, the consummation being hindered by circumstances independent of the will of the author. The act or omission, although it does not cause death, is carried to such a length as, at the time of carrying it to that length, the offender considers sufficient to cause death.¹³

To justify a conviction under this section it is not essential that bodily injury capable of causing death should have been inflicted. Although the nature of injury actually caused may often give considerable assistance in coming to a finding as to the intention of the accused, such intention may also be deduced from other circumstances, and may even, in some cases, be ascertained without any reference at all to actual wounds.¹⁴ This section makes a distinction between an act of the accused and its result, if any. Such an act may not be attended by any result so far as the person assaulted is concerned but still there may be cases in which the culprit would be liable under this section. If a person knows that a certain result will ensue from his act he must be deemed to intend such result by the act. Further, it is not necessary that the injury actually caused to the victim of the assault should be sufficient under ordinary circumstances to cause the death of the person assaulted. What the Court has to see is whether the act, irrespective of its result, was done with the intention or knowledge and under circumstances mentioned in this section.¹⁵

See notes on s. 511, infra, where there is a full discussion as to what constitutes an attempt.

1. 'Does any act with such intention or knowledge.'—For the purpose of constituting an attempt under this section there are two ingredients required, first, an evil intent or knowledge, and, secondly, an act done. If A intending to fire the stack of B, goes into a grocery shop and buys a box of matches, he does not commit the offence of attempting to fire the stack of B. But if he, having that intent, and having bought the box of matches, goes to the stack of B and lights the match, but it is put off by a puff of wind, and he is so prevented and interfered with, that would establish an attempt. If a person who has an evil intent does an act which is the last possible act that he could do towards the accomplishment of a particular crime that he has in his mind, he is not entitled to pray in his aid an obstacle intervening not known to himself. If he did all that he could do and completed the only remaining proximate act in his power, he cannot escape criminal responsibility, and this because, his own set volition and purpose having been given effect to to their full extent, a fact unknown to him and at variance with his own belief intervened to prevent the consequences of that act which he expected to ensue, ensuing.¹⁶ The accused must do an act with such a guilty intention and knowledge and in such circumstances that but for some intervening fact the act would have amounted to murder in the normal course of events.¹⁷ The intention or knowledge must be such as is necessary to constitute murder. Without this there can be no attempt to murder. Where persons, pursued by the police, turned round and fired, but nobody was hit and no bullets were found, it was held that they were guilty under this section.¹⁸ If a man fires off a fire-arm while a police-officer is attempting to arrest him, the natural conclusion is that he is attempting to shoot the police-officer. If the defence is that he had merely the intention of frightening the police-officer by firing in the air, then the burden of proving that fact is upon the defence.¹⁹

2. 'Under such circumstances.'—The Bombay High Court, differing from the meaning attached to these words in its earlier decision in Reg v. Cassidy,²⁰—viz., that there must be an act done under such circumstances that death might be caused if the act took effect, that is, the act must be capable of causing death in the natural and ordinary course of things—has held that they refer to facts which would introduce a defence to a charge of murder, such as, for instance, that the accused was acting in self-defence or in the course of military duty.²¹ The Lahore High Court has held that in order to bring a case within the purview of this section it is not necessary that the injury inflicted should in itself be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The language of the section makes it clear that even if mere hurt is caused by an act which is done with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that if by that act death is caused the offender will be guilty of murder, this section will apply. The section may apply even if no hurt is caused. The causing of hurt is merely an aggravating circumstance and it cannot, therefore, be reasonably argued that unless an injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death is inflicted on the victim, the intention contemplated by this section cannot be presumed. Under this section the intention precedes the act and is to be proved independently of the act, and not merely gathered from the consequences that ensue. All that is necessary to be established is the intention with which the act is done and if once that intention is established, the nature of the act will be immaterial.²² In this case the accused was in love with a woman and after her marriage their relations became strained. While she was on a visit to her parents' house, the accused went there armed with a spear and inflicted terrible wounds on her neck and jaw. It was held that he was guilty under this section.²³ Where the acts committed by the accused consisted only in running after the complainant with an axe in his hand and raising it to the shoulder when about four steps from the complainant, but before there was time to do anything further in pursuance of his purpose, the axe was snatched out of the accused's hand, it was held that the accused was not guilty of an attempt to commit murder as neither of his acts could per se have caused death, but that he was guilty of an attempt to cause grievous hurt.²⁴

The Allahabad High Court has held that the words 'under such circumstances' mean that the act must be done in such a way and with such ingredients that if it succeeded, and death was caused by it, the legal result would be murder according to ss. 299 and 300.²⁵ If the injury is actually inflicted, the nature of such injury may be of considerable assistance in arriving at the finding whether the accused had the intention of causing the death of the victim. The liability of an accused must be limited to the act which he in fact did and should not be extended so as to embrace the consequence of another act which he might have done but did not.' The Nagpur High Court has followed this view and held that administration of powdered glass was an act capable of causing death and the person administering it would be guilty under this section.² In a subsequent case where the accused stabbed a police constable, who was taking them to a police station, in order to escape, and the wound inflicted amounted to simple hurt, it was held that the accused were not guilty under this section.³

The Patna High Court has also held that in order that an act shall amount to an attempt to murder under this section all that it is necessary to prove is that if the act had caused death it would have amounted to murder provided that it was done with such intention or knowledge as would be necessary to be proved in the case of murder. The fact that an act results in minor injuries at all is not relevant for the purpose of deciding whether it amounted to an attempt to murder or not. The section itself provides a punishment of ten years for doing an act which amounts to an attempt to murder even though the act causes no hurt to any one; but if hurt is caused the offender is liable to a heavier punishment of transportation for life. Whether a blow with a hatchet is or is not capable of causing death in the natural or ordinary course of events will depend on a number of circumstances, e.g., the strength of the blow and the persistence of the attack. Where a number of blows are struck at the neck of a person not in a position to defend himself and if the attack was successful it would be impossible to take any other view than that the act amounted to murder and that when death does not result from such an attack it is clearly an attempt to murder within the meaning of this section.⁴

Where the accused pointed an uncapped gun at his superior officer (believing the gun to be capped) with the intention of murdering him, but his rifle was pushed up, and he was prevented from pulling the trigger, it was held that he was guilty not under this section but under s. 511. In this case Westropp, J., said that there "may be an attempt under s. 511 which does not come within s. 307"; and "s. 307 was not intended to exhaust all attempts to commit murder which should be punishable under the Code."⁵ But the Allahabad High Court has laid down that s. 511 does not apply to attempts to commit murder which are fully and exclusively provided for by this section. In this case the accused pointed a loaded pistol at a person to shoot him and pulled the trigger. The cap exploded but the charge did not go off. The accused was convicted under this section. A person is criminally responsible for an attempt to commit murder when, with the intention or knowledge requisite to its commission, he has done the last proximate act necessary to constitute the completed offence, and when the completion of the offence is only prevented by some cause independent of his volition. Straight, J., observed: "Now it appears to me that the attempts which are limited by s. 511 are attempts to commit offences, which by the Code itself are punishable either with 'transportation or imprisonment.' It cannot properly be said that the offence of murder is punishable with either of those things. In my opinion, if murder, as mentioned in ss. 299 and 300, was intended to be included, the Legislature would before the word transportation have inserted the word 'death.' But, again, the section goes on and says that, certain things being done, the person who does those acts shall, 'where no express provision is made for the punishment of such attempt,' be punished in a particular way. As I have pointed out, by s. 307...there is express provision made in the Code itself for the punishment of an attempt to murder. It seems therefore to me that when the framers of s. 511 drew it up in the terms that they have drawn it up, they especially meant to exclude those attempts to commit offences which in the various preceding sections of the Code were specifically and deliberately provided for with punishments enacted in the sections themselves. I have therefore for these reasons come to the conclusion that s. 307 is exhaustive and that no Court has any right to resort to the provisions of ss. 299 and 300 read with s. 511 for the purpose of convicting a person of the offence of attempted murder, which, according to the view of the Court, does not come within the provision of s. 307."⁶ The Lahore and the Nagpur High Courts have also dissented from the ruling in Cassidy's case.⁷ Mayne, in his Criminal Law, (4th edn., p. 532), thus criticises these remarks: "Upon this part of the judgment it may be remarked, as to the first reason, that murder is punishable with transportation as well as death. This is the case as regards every offence punishable with death, except in the single instance of murder by a person under transportation for life, which under s. 303 is only punishable, and in fact can only be punished, with death. Cases of murder therefore do come within the letter of s. 511. It seems obvious too that those words in s. 511 are not intended to exclude the very few cases where the penalty of death is added to that of transportation, but to exclude the numerous cases which are only punishable with fine. Further, that part of the learned Judge's reasoning would not apply to s. 308, which is in pari materia with s. 307, and worded in the same way, and can hardly admit of different treatment. As to the second reason, it is of course clear that any attempt, coming under s. 511, which is specifically provided for elsewhere, must be dealt with under the express provision. For instance, an attempt to wage war against the King must be dealt with under s. 121. It is also quite clear that any attempt to commit culpable homicide which falls under s. 307 or s. 308, must be dealt with under them and not under s. 511. What the Bombay case decided was, that an act done towards the commission of an attempt to murder, which was not an act by which murder could be effected, came under s. 511 because it did not come within this section. That being so, it fell within the wording of s. 511, as being a case 'where no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such attempt.' According to Mr. Justice Straight, such a case would go wholly unpunished.

"The same judgment appears to express doubt as to the propriety of the Bombay ruling that the act done in that case, viz., trying to discharge an uncapped rifle, supposed to be capped, did not come within s. 307. 'If he did all that he could do and completed the only remaining proximate act in his power, I do not think he can escape criminal responsibility, and this because, his own set volition and purpose having been given effect to to their full extent, a fact unknown to him and [at] variance with his own belief intervened to prevent the consequences of that act which he expected to ensue, ensuing.' This is well illustrated in Emperor v. Ananda.⁸ There the accused intending to kill his victim gave large doses of opium in milk but unknown to him the intended victim was a confirmed opium-eater and thus he escaped serious harm. But it may be submitted that the question is, not whether the accused would escape criminal responsibility—it was decided that he was liable under s. 511,—but whether he would be criminally responsible under the very special words of s. 307. If that section only applies where the prisoner has done an act, which, if carried to its utmost possible limits, without any interference from without, could cause death, and if his act could not have caused death, then his belief that it could have caused death is outside the question. Suppose, for instance, that Cassidy had put his rifle all ready loaded and capped for the purpose of committing the murder, and that in the excitement of the moment he had snatched up a comrade's rifle, which was unloaded, and the lock of which had been taken to pieces for repairs; that he had levelled it at his officer and pulled the trigger; it is plain that he had intended to do an act with such an intention that if by that act he had caused death he would have been guilty of murder; but that is not enough. The section requires that he should have done the act. He intended to discharge his own loaded rifle. He presented and tried to discharge a weapon which was as harmless as a broomstick."

The Bombay High Court has doubted Cassidy's case in a case in which the accused fired two shots from a revolver at point-blank range at Sir Earnest Hotson, Acting Governor of Bombay, but the bullets failed to take effect owing either to some defect in the ammunition or to the intervention of a leather wallet and currency notes in his pocket. The High Court held that the accused was guilty under this section.⁹ Beaumont, C. J., commenting on Cassidy's case, observed: "The learned Chief Justice in giving judgment says that to bring the case within s. 307 the act must be capable of causing death in the natural and ordinary course of things, and if the act complained of is not of that description, a prisoner cannot be convicted of attempt to murder under this section; and then he holds that the gun not having been in fact capped the act of the prisoner was not one which could have caused death. He went on, however, to hold that the case could be brought within s. 511 of the Indian Penal Code, and the accused was convicted under that section. If the reasoning of the learned Judges in that case be right as to the construction of s. 307, and if the act committed by the accused must be an act capable of causing death in the ordinary course, it seems to me that logically the section could never have any effect at all. If an act is done which in fact does not cause death, it is impossible to say that that precise act might have caused death. There must be some change in the act to produce a different result, and the extent to which the act done must be supposed to be varied to produce the hypothetical death referred to in s. 307 is merely a question of degree. If a man points at his enemy a gun which he believes to be loaded but which in fact is not loaded intending to commit murder (which is Cassidy's case), it is no doubt certain that no death will result from the act. But equally certain is it that no death will result if the accused fires a revolver at his enemy in such circumstances that in fact, whether through defect of aim, or the activity of the target, the bullet and the intended victim will not meet. If, however, s. 307 does not cover the case of a man who fires a gun at his enemy with intent to kill him but misses his aim, it is difficult to see how the section can ever have any operation. The case of Reg. v. Cassidy was considered by Mr. Justice Straight in Queen-Empress v. Nidha,¹⁰ and he differs from the reasoning of the Bombay High Court. . . I myself prefer the reasoning of Mr. Justice Straight in that case to the reasoning of this Court in Reg. v. Cassidy, although, as I have pointed out, it is not necessary for us to differ from the latter decision, which is indeed binding upon us, because the facts in that case were quite different from the facts with which we have to deal. . . The words 'under such circumstances' refer to facts which would introduce a defence to a charge of murder, such as, for instance, that the accused was acting in self-defence or in the course of military duty. But if you have an act done with a sufficiently guilty intention and knowledge and in circumstances which do not from their nature afford a defence to a charge of murder, and if the act is of such a nature as would have caused death in the usual course of events but for something beyond the accused's control which prevented that result, then it seems to me that the case falls within s. 307."¹¹

The Rangoon High Court has held in a case in which the accused presented a gun at the complainant and pulled the trigger, no report or discharge resulting, that, in the absence of evidence to show that the gun was loaded, the accused's act amounted to no more than presenting an unloaded gun at the complainant and pulling the trigger and that he was guilty under s. 352 and not this section.¹² The applicability of s. 511 of the Code is not discussed in this case.

The Court of Criminal Appeal in England has laid down that the completion or attempted completion of one of a series of acts intended by a man to result in killing is an attempt to murder even although this completed act would not, unless followed by the other acts, result in killing. It might be the beginning of the attempt, but would none the less be an attempt. In this case the accused was proved to have bought cyanide of potassium on December 22, 1909. On January 9, his mother was found dead in a sitting posture on a sofa, in her house. There was a round table standing two feet from the sofa, on the further side of which was a wine-glass, three-parts filled with a liquid made up of a drink called nectar, which was afterwards shown to contain two grains of cyanide of potassium. There were also on the table a nectar bottle, two lumps of sugar, and a spoon. There was no evidence to show that she had taken any of this liquid, and the result of the post-mortem and of the analysis of the contents of the wine-glass was to show she had not died from poisoning by cyanide of potassium, but that death was most probably caused by syncope or heart failure, due to fright or some other external cause; and, further, that the quantity of cyanide of potassium in the wine-glass was, even if she had taken the whole, insufficient to cause her death. The accused did not live in the house, but he said he had purchased the poison for case-hardening a chisel and had placed it in a cupboard in the room where the mother was found dead, and that he thought it possible she might have taken it from there. No traces of the poison, however, were found after her death either in the cupboard or in the house. There was a good deal of evidence showing that the accused had a motive for killing his mother, viz., to obtain her money. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in drawing the inference that the accused had put the cyanide of potassium in the wine-glass with intent to murder his mother. It was urged on behalf of the accused that the act of which the accused was guilty, viz. the putting the poison in the wine-glass was a complete act and could not be and was not intended by the accused to have the effect of killing her at once. It could not kill unless it were followed by other acts which he might never have done. But the Court decided that the accused was guilty of attempt to murder.¹³ Under illustration (d) to this section if a person places poisoned food on another's table intending to kill him he is guilty of attempting to murder. But looking to the wording of this section the poisoned food should have been capable of causing death if it is eaten. In White's case it was found that two grains of cyanide of potassium were insufficient to cause death. It seems, therefore, doubtful whether this section would apply in similar circumstances.

3. 'Hurt.'—See s. 319, infra.

Amendment—Attempts by life-convicts.—This clause was provided by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (XXVII of 1870), s. 11, because a person attempting to murder might, if hurt was caused, be transported for life or imprisoned for ten years, but where the offender was already transported for life, the law, by a strange oversight, actually awarded no penalty. The words "the first paragraph of" in the last line of ill. (c) were inserted by the amending Act (XII of 1891), Sch. II.

CASES.

Death resulting not from act of accused but through other causes.

Where a child wrapped in a quilt was abandoned in a thicket close to a house and footpath, and was found very shortly after its exposure, the child having died, not from exposure but from the ignorance of the person who found it and who gave it no food,¹⁴ it was held that the offence of attempt to murder was committed.

Mutual infliction of injury.—Two accused in the course of a fight inflicted on each other injuries so serious that their dying depositions had to be taken in both cases. There was no eye-witness to the occurrence; and the evidence in each trial consisted of that of the complainant, the corroborative evidence of the wounds on the complainant and the admission of the accused that he was himself wounded in the occurrence. In separate trials, each was convicted of an offence under this section. It was held that as either of the accused would be entitled, in the event of the other dying of the wounds, to the benefit of a reasonable doubt and to plead that the case came within Exception 4 to s. 300, neither accused could be legally convicted under this section.¹⁵

Where the fight is accidental owing to a sudden quarrel a conviction under this section is not called for but the proper conviction would be one under s. 326.¹⁶

Poison.—Where the accused intentionally put arsenic into her husband's food in order to kill him and the husband died some time afterwards from inflammation of the brain, and there was no evidence that the poison was even a secondary cause of the deceased's death;¹⁷ and where the accused asked a doctor to supply her with medicine for the purpose of poisoning her son-in-law,¹⁸ it was held that an attempt to murder had not been committed. Where a woman administered dhatura to three members of her family, who did not die, it was held that an attempt to murder was committed as she must be presumed to have known that the administration of dhatura was likely to cause death, although she might not have administered it with that intention.¹⁹ But, where the object of administering dhatura was to commit robbery, and one of the persons to whom it was administered died and another taken seriously ill, it was held that in respect of the former the offence committed was that of grievous hurt and in respect of the latter the offence fell under s. 328.²⁰

Poison intended for one shared by others.—Where sweetmeat containing arsenic sent to A with the intention of causing her death was also shared by B and C, and none of them died, it was held that the accused was guilty of an attempt to murder not only A but also B and C.²¹

Attempt to cause death by suffocation.—The accused enticed into her house a boy aged nine years, used violence to him and removed several jewels from his person and, being unable to remove his anklets and earrings, tied his wrist and neck with a rope, put a cloth in his mouth, took him into a room and placed him sitting in a jar, which was only twenty-two inches deep, all night, and put a millstone on the mouth of it, through three holes in which there was a stinted supply of air. She did not give him food at night and before dawn lifted the millstone once and looked at the boy but replaced it. The boy untied the rope, and owing to the omission of the accused to watch the jar and the room, got out in the morning and ran home. It was held that the accused was rightly convicted under this section.²²

Attempt to cause death by drowning.—The accused in the course of a quarrel with her sister-in-law and in a fit of anger flung her child, three years old, into a pond four feet deep on the edge of which her house was situated and at the same time gave expression to a wish that the death of the child should rest as a curse on the woman with whom she was quarrelling. It was held that the circumstances gave rise to a presumption that the intention of the accused was to cause death of the child, and that she was, therefore, guilty of an offence under this section, although the child was picked up by a stander-by without loss of time.²³

Attempt to discharge loaded fire-arm.—B drew a loaded pistol from his pocket for the purpose of murdering S, but before he had time to do anything further in pursuance of his purpose the pistol was snatched out of his hand, and he was at once arrested. It was held that he had attempted to shoot.²⁴ On the trial of an indictment under 24 & 25 Vic., c. 100, s. 18, which enacts that whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously, "by drawing a trigger or in any other manner," attempt to discharge any kind of loaded arms at any person with intent to do grievous bodily harm, shall be guilty of felony, it was proved that the accused drew from his pocket a loaded revolver and pointed it towards his mother. His wrists were seized by by-standers as he was raising the pistol, and after a struggle it was taken from him. During the struggle his finger and thumb were seen fumbling about the revolver, which cocked automatically when the trigger was pulled. It was held that there was evidence upon which the accused could properly be convicted of an attempt to discharge the revolver within the meaning of the statute.²⁵ During an interview between the accused and the prosecutor, the former drew a loaded revolver from his coat pocket. The prosecutor immediately seized the accused and prevented him from raising his arm; a struggle ensued, in the course of which the accused nearly succeeded in getting his arm free, but after a few minutes the prosecutor wrested the revolver from him and he was taken into custody. During the struggle the accused several times said to the prosecutor, "You've got to die." It was held that the accused had attempted to discharge the revolver.¹

At a public meeting held in Calcutta a student pointed a five-chambered loaded revolver at Sir Andrew Fraser, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and pulled the trigger twice, but owing to the damaged condition of the percussion cap the revolver did not go off. He was prosecuted and convicted under this section.² Where a young man of twenty-five and accustomed to shooting was found to have fired at a person at a distance only of some six paces, the cartridge containing shot of about No. 6 size, it was held that he must have known that his act was likely to cause death. If the person shot at had died, the accused would undoubtedly have been guilty of murder. The fact that the back of the chair on which the victim was seated intercepted a number of bullets and thus avoided a fatal result was held not to reduce the offence from one under this section to one under s. 324.³ Where the accused used a pistol with reckless disregard to consequences against a constable who was chasing him and the bullet struck the constable and remained inside the body, it was held that it must be presumed that the accused intended to cause death and that he was guilty under this section.⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the death of a human being was attempted.

(2) That such death was attempted to be caused by, or in consequence of, the act of the accused.

(3) That such act was done with the intention of causing death ; or that it was done with the intention of causing such bodily injury as (a) the accused knew to be likely to cause death ; or (b) was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death ; or that the accused attempted to cause such death by doing an act known to him to be so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause (a) death, or (b) such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, the accused having no excuse for incurring the risk of causing such death or injury.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

The Court can convict the accused of offences under this section read with s. 34 or 114, although he is charged only with offences under this section and ss. 148 and 149.⁵

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, did an act, to wit——, with such intention (or knowledge), and under such circumstances, that if by that act you had caused the death of AB, you would have been guilty of murder [and that you caused hurt to the said AB by the said Act,] and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 307 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Punishment.—The Frontier Crimes Regulation, 1901, ss. 6, 11 (3) (d), and 12 (2); the Burma Laws Act, 1898, s. 4 (3) (b); the Criminal Tribes Act, 1897, s. 6; the Bengal Criminal (Second Amendment) Act (Beng. Act XI of 1932), s. 3, apply to offences under this section.

Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

Reduction of sentence.—Where the accused was labouring under a great mental strain as a result of punishment inflicted upon him his sentence was reduced.⁶

Similarly where the accused had committed a murderous attack on his brother but had subsequently made up his quarrel his sentence was reduced.⁷

Mental incapacity.—In awarding punishment the fact that the accused had contracted the habit of taking morphia and was a very fickle-minded person was taken into consideration although there was no indication of a plainly marked mental aberration.⁸

308. Whoever does any act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that, if he by that act caused death, he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both; and, if hurt is caused to any person by such act, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Attempt to commit culpable homicide.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, on grave and sudden provocation, fires a pistol at Z, under such circumstances that if he thereby caused death he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

COMMENT.

The wording of this section is the same as that of the preceding one except that it deals with an attempt to commit culpable homicide. The punishment provided is therefore not so severe.

An attempt to commit a crime is an act done with intent to commit that crime, and forming part of a series of acts which would constitute its actual commission if it were not interrupted.⁹

PRACTICE.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, did an act, to wit——, with such intention (or knowledge), and under such circumstances, that if by that act you had caused the death of AB, you would have been guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder [and that you caused hurt to the said AB by the said Act], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 308 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Punishment.—The Frontier Crimes Regulation, 1901, ss. 11 (3) (d) and 12 (2) and the Criminal Tribes Act, 1897, s. 6, apply to offences under this section.

Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

309. Whoever attempts to commit suicide¹ and does any act towards the commission of such offence,² shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Attempt to commit suicide.

COMMENT.

This is the only instance in which an attempt to commit an offence is punishable but where actual commission cannot be punished.

⁹ Stephen's Digest of Criminal Law, Art. 50.

1. 'Commit suicide.'—To 'commit suicide' is for a person voluntarily to do an act (or, as it is submitted, to refrain from taking bodily sustenance), for the purpose of destroying his own life, being conscious of that probable consequence, and having, at the time, 'sufficient mind to will the destruction of life.'¹⁰

2. 'Does any act towards the commission of such offence.'—Such act must be in the course of the attempt.

Where a woman with the intention of committing suicide by throwing herself in a well, actually ran towards it where she was seized by a person, it was held that she was not guilty of attempt to commit suicide, because she might have changed her mind, and she was caught before she did anything which might be regarded as the commencement of the offence.¹¹ Where the accused jumped into a well to avoid and escape from the police; and when rescued he came out of the well of his own accord, it was held that in the absence of evidence that he jumped into the well to commit suicide he could not be convicted of an offence under this section.¹² Where a woman who was in an advanced stage of pregnancy threw herself into a well being driven mad by pains of prolonged labour and in consequence of that the child was born dead, it was held that she could not be held guilty of attempting to voluntarily cause miscarriage but of attempting to commit suicide.¹³ A village woman was ill-treated by her husband. There was a quarrel between the two, and the husband had threatened that he would beat her. Late at night the woman, taking her six months old baby in her arms, slipped away from the house. After she had gone some distance she heard somebody coming up behind her, and when she turned round and saw her husband was pursuing her she got into a panic and jumped down a well nearby with the baby in her arms. The result was that the baby died and the woman recovered. She was charged with attempt to commit suicide. It was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section, for the word "attempt" connoted some conscious endeavour to accomplish the act, and the accused in jumping down the well was not thinking at all of taking her own life but only of escaping from her husband.¹⁴

The pounding of oleander roots with the intention to poison one's self with it was held not to constitute this offence.¹⁵ The act amounted merely to preparation to commit suicide. The Court has always to consider when the preparation had ended and attempt commenced. A person who emasculated himself was held to have committed no offence under this section, the act not being ordinarily likely to cause death.¹⁶

Modes of committing suicide.—"In India, of the various methods of committing suicide, drowning occupies the first position, and after it comes hanging. In England, hanging occupies the first position, then follows poisoning, cut-throat, and lastly drowning. In India, men resort to drowning and hanging as a means of self-destruction in about equal numbers, while six out of seven women who commit suicide prefer the water. In England four times as many males as females destroy themselves by hanging, and four times as many males as females by cut-throat, whilst the number of males and females who commit suicide by drowning and by poison is about equal. The number of suicides by lethal weapons is exceedingly small compared with that which exist in England. The most common causes of suicide in India are... jealousy, family discord, destitution, and physical suffering. Jealousy, with all the bitter feelings which it engenders, is the cause of a large number of female suicides."¹⁷

Attempts to commit suicide are of three classes :—

(1) Persons who are driven to attempt to commit suicide by real intense suffering either mental or physical. Every instance of this kind should be treated according to its peculiar features.

(2) Where suicide is attempted in a moment of passion, with little or no reflection, and no very definite motive, punishment, though not severe, should be inflicted.

(8) Where the suicide partakes of the nature of poison, severe punishment may be inflicted.

English law.—If two persons mutually agree to commit suicide together, and the means employed to produce death only take effect on one, the survivor will be guilty of the murder of the one who died.¹⁸

Amendment.—The words “or with fine, or with both” were substituted for the words, “and shall also be liable to fine” by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (VIII of 1882), s. 7.¹⁹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the act of the accused amounted to an attempt.

(2) That the attempt was complete by doing an act towards the commission of suicide.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, attempted to commit suicide and did an act, to wit——, towards the commission of it, and you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 309 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

Punishment.—This section requires the Court to pass a substantive sentence of imprisonment. A sentence of fine and of imprisonment in default of payment is an illegal sentence.²⁰ But severe sentences should not be passed in cases of attempt to commit suicide, where the accused suffers from a bodily affliction which is likely to cause him acute mental depression.²¹

It is not necessary to inflict a sentence of imprisonment upon a person who, on account of family discord, destitution, loss of a dear relation or other cause of a like nature, overcomes the instinct of self-preservation and decides to take his life. In such a case, the unfortunate person deserves indulgence, and should be either released on probation of good conduct, or sentenced to a fine if he is not too poor to pay the fine. These observations apply with greater force to the case of a woman who attempts to commit suicide in similar circumstances.²²

310. Whoever, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall have been habitually associated with any other or others for the purpose of committing robbery¹ or child-stealing by means of or accompanied with murder,² is a thug.

COMMENT.

This and the following section incorporate the provisions of the Thuggee Act, 1836.

1. ‘Robbery.’—See s. 390, infra. 2. ‘Murder.’—See s. 300, supra.

311. Whoever is a thug, shall be punished with transportation for life, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

Gangs of persons habitually associated for the purpose of inveigling and murdering travellers or others in order to take their property, etc., are called Thugs. Thugs are robbers and dacoits, but robbers and dacoits are not Thugs. Thugs committed robbery or dacoity or kidnapping always accompanied with murder. Killing of the victim was the essential thing. Thugs have practically disappeared from the land, but the harrowing tales of their doings are extremely shocking. No lighter punishment could have terrorised them.

Under s. 310 any one who habitually associates with others for the purpose of committing robbery, etc., is a Thug. Actual commission of any act is not necessary.

The provisions of the Thugce Act with a slight alteration are incorporated in s. 310 and this section.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused was associated with other person or persons.

(2) That he was so associated after the passing of this Code.

(3) That such persons, including the accused, were associated for the purpose of committing robbery, or child-stealing, by means of, or accompanied with, murder.

(4) That such persons were habitually associated for that purpose.²³

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, were a Thug, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 311 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Punishment.—The Criminal Tribes Act, 1897, s. 6, applies to offences under this section.

Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

Of the Causing of Miscarriage, of Injuries to unborn Children, of the Exposure of Infants, and of the Concealment of Births.

312. Whoever voluntarily causes a woman with child to miscarry¹ shall, if such miscarriage be not caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the woman,² be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both; and, if the woman be quick with child,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—A woman who causes herself to miscarry, is within the meaning of this section.

COMMENT.

This section deals with the causing of miscarriage with the consent of the woman, while the next section deals with the causing of miscarriage without her consent.

The authors of the Code observe : “With respect to the law on the subject of abortion, we think it necessary to say only that we entertain strong apprehensions that this or any other law on that subject may, in this country, be abused to the vilest purposes. The charge of abortion is one which, even where it is not substantiated, often leaves a stain on the honour of families. The power of bringing a false accusation of this description is therefore a formidable engine in the hands of unprincipled men. This part of the law will, unless great care be taken, produce few convictions, but much misery and terror to respectable families, and a large harvest of profit to the vilest pests of society. We trust that it may be in our power in the Code of procedure to lay down rules which may prevent such an abuse. Should we not be able to do so, we are inclined to think that it would be our duty to advise his Lordship in Council rather to suffer abortion, where the mother is a party to the offence, to remain wholly unpunished, than to repress it by provisions which would occasion more suffering to the innocent than to the guilty."²⁴ This offence is, therefore, taken out of the cognizance of the police.

Ingredients.—This section requires two essentials :—

1. Voluntarily causing a woman with child to miscarry.
2. Such miscarriage should not have been caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the woman.

1. 'Whoever voluntarily causes a woman with child to miscarry.'—The offender may be the woman herself or any other person.

'Voluntarily.'—See s. 39, supra.

'With child' means pregnant, and it is not necessary to show that 'quickening', that is, perception by the mother of the movements of the foetus has taken place or that the embryo has assumed a foetal form, the stage to which pregnancy has advanced and the form which the ovum or embryo may have assumed are immaterial. Where a woman was acquitted on a charge of causing herself to miscarry on the ground that she had only been pregnant for one month and that there was nothing which could be called foetus or child, it was held that the acquittal was bad in law.²⁵

2. 'Such miscarriage be not caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the woman.'—Miscarriage is the premature expulsion of the child or foetus from the mother's womb at any period of pregnancy before the term of gestation is completed. Where a child was full-grown a conviction under this section was set aside and one under s. 511 for attempt to bring about miscarriage was maintained.¹ The offence defined in this section can only be committed when the woman is in fact pregnant.² For, although there may be a guilty intention and attempt to commit it on the person of a woman believed to be, but who really is not, pregnant, the offence, as here defined, seems to require that the woman should be with child. If it appears that the woman was not with child at all, the accused must be acquitted.³

If miscarriage be caused in good faith for saving the life of a pregnant woman no offence is committed. As to what is 'good faith', see s. 52.

A young girl, not quite fifteen years of age, was pregnant as the result of rape. A surgeon, of the highest skill, openly, in one of the London Hospitals, without fee, performed the operation of abortion. He was charged under the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, with unlawfully procuring the abortion of the girl. The jury were directed that it was for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the operation was not performed in good faith for the purpose only of preserving the life of the girl. The surgeon had not got to wait until the patient was in peril of immediate death, but it was his duty to perform the operation if, on reasonable grounds, and with adequate knowledge, he was of the opinion that the probable consequence of the continuance of the pregnancy would be to make the patient a physical and mental wreck.⁴

3. 'Quick with child.'—Quickening is the name applied to peculiar sensations experienced by a woman about the fourth or fifth month of pregnancy. The symptoms are popularly ascribed to the first perception of the movements of the foetus. But quickening is not a constant, uniform, and well-marked distinction of the pregnant state.⁵ "Quick with child" is having conceived. 'With quick child' is when the child was quickened."⁶

It has been held under an English statute that the expression 'Quick with child' means when the woman has felt the child move within her.⁷

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the woman was with child : or (if under the second clause) that she was quick with child.

(2) That the accused did some act likely to cause a miscarriage.

(3) That she did so voluntarily.

(4) That such woman did miscarry in consequence.

(5) That such miscarriage was not caused in good faith in order to save the woman's life.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, voluntarily caused (name of the woman) then being with child to miscarry, such miscarriage not being caused by you in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the said——, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 312 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Punishment.—In awarding punishment where a woman has caused herself to miscarry, it should not be forgotten that “the high caste young widow, who, to hide her shame, should, at the risk of life, cause herself to miscarry does not, under the peculiar circumstances in which she is placed by the institutions of society, commit an offence in any respect of like criminality with the seducer of a young girl, or married woman, who to cover her crime should cause such woman to miscarry.”⁸

313. Whoever commits the offence defined in the last preceding section without the consent¹ of the woman, whether the woman is quick with child² or not, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Causing miscarriage without woman's consent.

COMMENT.

When the consent of the woman is not taken the offence comes under this section. When the consent is taken then s. 312 applies. Again, under this section the person procuring the abortion is alone punished : under s. 312 such person as well as the woman who causes herself to miscarry are both punished.

1. ‘Consent.’—See s. 90, supra. 2. ‘Quick with child.’—See s. 312, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those required in s. 312 ; and further it must be established that the woman did not consent to such abortion.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, voluntarily caused AB (the woman who miscarried) then being with child to miscarry without her consent, such miscarriage not being caused by you in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the said AB, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 313 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

⁸ Law Commissioners' 1st Rep., s. 349, p. 272.

314. Whoever, with intent to cause the miscarriage of a woman with child,¹ does any act which causes the death of such woman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine ;

Death caused by act done with intent to cause miscarriage.

and if the act is done without the consent² of the woman, shall be punished either with transportation for life, or with the punishment above mentioned.

If act done without woman's consent.

Explanation.—It is not essential to this offence that the offender should know that the act is likely to cause death.

COMMENT.

This section provides for the case where death has occurred in causing miscarriage. This species of homicide may be committed involuntarily, that is, in the language of the Code, by a person who does not intend to cause (or think it likely that he will cause) death by the act which he does. If A, intending only to cause miscarriage to Z, involuntarily does an act which causes her death, he is liable to punishment under this section. And he is thus liable whether he acts with caution in order to prevent risk to Z's life, or whether he acts rashly or negligently. Even if he takes such precautions that there is no reasonable probability that Z's death will be caused, and if the medicine is rendered deadly by some accident which no human sagacity could foresee or by some peculiarity in Z's constitution, such as there was no ground whatever to expect, A will be liable to punishment under this section for causing death by an act done with intent to cause miscarriage.⁹

1. 'Intent to cause the miscarriage of a woman with child.'—The act of the accused must have been done with intent to cause the miscarriage of a woman with child. Where a poisonous drug was administered to a woman to procure miscarriage, and it was not proved that the accused knew that the drug was likely to cause death, it was held that they had committed an offence under this section.¹⁰

2. 'Consent.'—The consent of the woman freely and intelligently given is allowed to mitigate the offence. If A kills Z by administering abortives to her with the knowledge that those abortives are likely to cause her death, he is guilty of culpable homicide, which will be culpable homicide, by consent, if Z agrees to run the risk, and murder, if Z did not so agree.

As to the definition of 'consent' see s. 90, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the woman was with child.

(2) That the accused did an act to cause miscarriage.

(3) That he did so with that intention.

(4) That such act caused the death of the woman.

(5) (If the case comes under the second clause) that such act was done by the accused without the consent of the woman.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, with intent to cause the miscarriage of (name of the woman) did a certain act, to wit—, which caused the death of the said—, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 314 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

⁹ M. & M. 280.

¹⁰ Kalachand Gope, (1868) 10 W. R. (Cr.) 59.

315. Whoever before the birth of any child does any act with the intention of thereby preventing that child from being born alive or causing it to die after its birth, and does by such act prevent that child from being born alive, or causes it to die after its birth, shall, if such act be not caused in good faith¹ for the purpose of saving the life of the mother, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, or with fine, or with both.

Act done with intent to prevent child being born alive or to cause it to die after birth.

COMMENT.

The offence which this section punishes is the injury to the child's life.

Any act done with the intention here mentioned which results in the destruction of the child's life, whether before or after its birth, is made punishable.

1. 'Good faith.'—See s. 52, supra.

English law.—If a person intending to procure abortion does an act which causes a child to be born so much earlier than the natural time, that it is born in a state much less capable of living, and afterwards dies in consequence of its exposure to the external world; the person who by his misconduct so brings the child into the world, and puts it thereby in a situation in which it cannot live, is guilty of murder; and the mere existence of a possibility that something might have been done to prevent the death will not render it the less a murder.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the woman was with child.

(2) That the accused did an act, before the child was born, calculated to prevent the child from being born alive, or to cause it to die after its birth.

(3) That such act was done by the accused with that intention.

(4) That such act was done, not in good faith, for the purpose of saving the mother's life.

(5) That the child was born dead, or died after its birth.

(6) That such death was caused by the above-mentioned act of the accused.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—The charge should describe the act by which the accused intended to prevent the child being born alive, and should also state that the act was not caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the mother.¹¹

Form.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, did an act, to wit ---, to XY before the birth of her child, with the intention of thereby preventing that child from being born alive (or causing it to die after its birth), and by that act did prevent that child from being born alive (or caused it to die after its birth) and the said act was not done in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the mother, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 315 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

316. Whoever does any act under such circumstances, that if he thereby caused death he would be guilty of culpable homicide, and does by such act cause the death of a quick¹ unborn child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Causing death of quick unborn child by act amounting to culpable homicide.

¹¹ (1865) 3 W. R. (Cr. L.) 5.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, knowing that he is likely to cause the death of a pregnant woman, does an act which, if it caused the death of the woman, would amount to culpable homicide. The woman is injured but does not die; but the death of an unborn quick child with which she is pregnant is thereby caused. A is guilty of the offence defined in this section.

COMMENT.

This section punishes offences against children in the womb where the pregnancy has advanced beyond the stage of quickening, and where the death is caused after the quickening and before the birth of the child. Any act or omission of such a nature and done under such circumstances as would amount to the offence of culpable homicide, if the sufferer were a living person, will, if done to a quick unborn child, whose death is caused by it, constitute the offence here punished. If a person strikes a pregnant woman and thereby causes the death of her quick unborn child, he will be guilty of the offence here defined, if the blow was intended by him to cause the woman's death or was one which he knew or had reason to believe to be likely to cause it.¹²

1. 'Quick.'—See s. 312, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the woman was quick with child.

(2) That the accused did an act to cause the death of such child.

(3) That the circumstances, under which such act was done, were such as to make the accused guilty of culpable homicide, if death had been caused. (See s. 300).

(4) That such act did cause the death of the quick unborn child.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, did an act, to wit—, under circumstances, to wit—, that if you thereby caused death, you will be guilty of culpable homicide, and did by such act cause the death of a quick unborn child of XY, and you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 316 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

317. Whoever being the father or mother of a child under the age of twelve years, or having the care of such child,¹

Exposure and abandonment of child under twelve years, by parent or person having care of it.

shall expose or leave such child in any place with the intention of wholly abandoning such child,² shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.³—This section is not intended to prevent the trial of the offender for murder or culpable homicide, as the case may be, if the child die in consequence of the exposure.⁴

COMMENT.

Object.—This section is intended to prevent the abandonment or desertion by a parent of his or her children of tender years, in such a manner that the children, not being able to take care of themselves, may run the risk of dying or being injured. It does not apply when children are left under the care of others.¹³

Must. Bhuran, (1877) P. R. No. 5 of 1878; Mussumat Bhagan, (1878) P. R. No. 4 of 1879.

Scope.—This section applies where a child is exposed and no death supervenes; if, however, death follows, the conviction must be under s. 304.¹⁴ The offence is complete notwithstanding that no actual danger or risk of danger arises to the child's life.

Ingredients.—The section has three essentials :—

1. The person coming within its purview must be father or mother or must have the care of the child.
2. Such child must be under the age of twelve years.
3. The child must have been exposed or left in any place with the intention of wholly abandoning it.

1. 'Whoever being the father or mother . . . , or having the care of such child.'—Both are equally bound by ties of duty, and this equally whether the child be born in wedlock or be illegitimate. An infant requiring nurture, or a child of tender years, will ordinarily be in the immediate charge of the mother, the father's duty being that of providing for both the mother and the offspring. The person who has the immediate care of the child is the person contemplated. A parent who is absent, but who has provided duly for the maintenance and protection of his child, would not be criminally answerable for its abandonment by the person in whose charge he had left it. The offence consists in the desertion of the child by a person who is bound by nature to support and protect it, or who has taken on himself that duty, whether by adopting the child, or by way of contract with the parent, or in some other way.¹⁵ Any person receiving an infant from its mother on the understanding that the mother never desired or wished to have it back again, must be regarded as a person having the care of it. The mother of a newly-born child, with a view to dispose of it, gave it to her sister who carried it by a train and left it in a compartment. The child was found wrapped up and a bottle of milk was left by its side. It was held that the mother was guilty under this section and s. 109, and her sister under this section only.¹⁶

'Age of twelve years.'—Twelve years is the period fixed during which a child is protected from abandonment by its father, mother or guardian.

2. 'Expose or leave such child in any place with the intention of wholly abandoning such child.'—The word 'expose' 'literally means to physically put outside, so that such putting outside involves some physical risk to the person put out. Having reference to a child, it would mean putting it somewhere where it could not receive the protection necessary for its tender age; as, for instance, putting it outside the house, whereby it would be exposed to the risk of climate, wild beasts and the like. The exposure contemplated by the Act was one by which danger to life might immediately ensue."¹⁷ But the Madras High Court has held that it is not necessary that the exposure and abandonment must be under such circumstances as to endanger the life or the health of the child. The only intention required to complete the offence is an intention of wholly abandoning the child.¹⁸

'Leave.'—As this word "comes in immediate juxtaposition with the word 'expose' the word 'leaving' means leaving in a sense ejusdem generis as the exposure and indicates an offence only slightly distinguishable from exposing. It cannot... mean leaving in the large sense of abandonment, but must be construed in strict connection with the word 'exposure.' The narrower construction of the words 'expose or leave' is much strengthened by the insertion of those striking words 'in any place'.¹⁹ "In order to make the 'leaving' of a child an offence under section 317... the child must be left without protection. I think this is clear in the first place because the word 'leave' being coupled in that Section with the word 'expose', must on the principle 'noscitur ex sociis' be considered as to some extent taking its colour from the word 'expose', and must be construed as meaning leave under circumstances more or less resembling those of an exposure. I think this is clear further from the intention which is expressly required by the Section to constitute the offence. There must be an intention wholly to abandon the child : now I think an intention wholly to abandon a child means something more than an intention to go away from it and never to return to it. The phrase to abandon a child in its ordinary acceptance means something more than merely to go away from it. In fact it seems to me that here again the idea of leaving without protection comes in.”²⁰

‘With the intention of wholly abandoning such child.’—The gist of the offence is the exposure or leaving with intention to wholly abandon, and the manner of exposing or leaving and the consequences likely to ensue are not essential ingredients, though they may be taken into consideration in passing the sentence.²¹ The section does not apply to a case of mere neglect or temporary abandonment.²² The Legislature looks rather to the intention of the accused than to the consequences of the act done. Where a woman abandoned her newly-born child by leaving it in a place which was quite close to a village and near a public road, and the child was soon discovered, it was held that she was guilty of this offence.²³ A woman, mother of an illegitimate child, six months old, left it in charge of a blind woman saying she would soon return. She went away to another village and did not return; and apparently she never intended to return. It was held that she could not be convicted under this section.²⁴ The accused, a married woman, eloped leaving her child one and a half month old, in the house of her husband. It was held that this was not a ‘leaving with the intention of wholly abandoning the child.’²⁵

English cases.—A, the mother of a child five weeks old, and B put the child into a hamper, wrapped up in a shawl and packed with shavings and cotton wool, and A, with the connivance of B, took the hamper to a railway station, paid for its carriage, and told the clerk to send it to G. She said nothing as to the contents of the hamper, which was delivered to the father of the child at G. The child died three weeks afterwards from causes not attributable to the conduct of A and B. It was held that they were guilty of abandoning and exposing the child.¹ A woman who was living apart from her husband, and who had the actual custody of their child, brought the child, and left it at the father’s door, telling him she had done so. He knowingly allowed it to remain from about 7 P.M., till 1 A.M., when it was removed by a constable, the child being then cold and stiff. It was held that though the father had not had the actual custody and possession of the child, yet, as he was by law bound to provide for it, his allowing it to remain where he did was an abandonment and exposure of the child by him, whereby its life was endangered.²

3. Explanation.—The Explanation indicates “with much clearness the scope and purview of the section and the nature of the evil against which it sought to provide. That explanation provides for the case of injuries actually ensuing that the guilty person shall be punished for the injury so inflicted according to the circumstances under which the injury is done, i.e., for murder or culpable homicide, as the case may be.”³ Though the death of the child may not ensue the offence may amount to an attempt punishable under s. 307. See ill. (b) to that section.

4. ‘If the child die in consequence of the exposure.’—This expression means ‘dies from cold or other result of exposure.’ Hence, where a new-born child was exposed, and it died after, but not, except remotely, on account of its exposure, the mother was acquitted of murder and convicted under this section.⁴ Where a woman deserted her illegitimate child of ten days old, but under circumstances in which it could and, as a matter of fact, did, obtain food, and the child died after four days from natural causes, it was held that the mother could not be convicted under this section.⁵

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the child is under twelve years of age.

(2) That the accused is the father or mother, or the person having the care of that child.

(3) That he exposed or left such child in the place in question.

(4) That he so exposed or left the child with the intention of wholly abandoning it.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, being the father (or mother or having the care) of a certain child under the age of twelve years, to wit—, of the age of—years, did expose or leave the said child in a certain place, to wit—, with the intention of wholly abandoning the said child, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 317 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

318. Whoever, by secretly burying or otherwise disposing of the dead body of a child¹ whether such child die before or after or, during its birth,² intentionally conceals or endeavours to conceal the birth³ of such child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Concealment of birth by secret disposal of dead body.

COMMENT.

This section deals with the secret burial of a child. If it is a foetus only then ss. 312 and 511 of the Code will apply.

The facility with which the life of an infant at its birth is extinguished, and the temptation to take it away in cases of bastard children, justify such a provision.

Bentham says that this offence ought to be punished by branding it with disgrace. It is commonly the fear of shame which is its cause; it needs a greater shame to repress it.

Ingredients.—The section requires three essentials :—

1. Secret burying or otherwise disposing of the dead body of a child.
2. It is immaterial whether such child died before or after its birth.
3. Intention to conceal the birth of such child by such secret burying or disposal.

1. 'Secretly burying or otherwise disposing of the dead body of a child.'—This includes every possible mode of disposing of the body. It is sufficient if the body is temporarily concealed with the intention of removing it elsewhere when opportunity is offered.⁶

This section refers to the disposal of a dead body secretly⁷ and does not meet the case of a person depositing a child alive in any place which is punishable under the last section. There must be a secret disposition of the body and an offence under this section is not committed if the body is left in a public place.⁸ Leaving the dead body of a child in two boxes, but not locked or fastened, one being placed inside the other in a bed-room, but in such a position as to attract the attention of those who daily resorted to the room was held to be not a secret disposition of the body.⁹ It was held similarly where the dead body of a child was placed on a dung heap quite close to a public road.¹⁰ But where a woman threw a child down a privy;¹¹ and where a woman placed a living child in a place of concealment, and on subsequently re-visiting that place found the child dead and left it there,¹² it was held that this offence was committed.

It should be distinctly proved that the child was dead at the time of disposal. Where a woman, delivered of a child born alive, endeavoured to conceal the birth thereof, by depositing the child while alive in a corner of a field, leaving the infant to die from exposure, which it did, and the dead body was afterwards found in the corner, it was held that she could not be convicted of secretly "disposing of the dead body of a child."¹³

No endeavour to conceal birth of child.—Where a woman having been delivered of a dead child left it at the place of birth which was in the compound of her house and told no one about it, she was held not guilty of this offence.¹⁴ The accused being pregnant with an illegitimate child, went to the village jungle for purposes of nature and there, in the presence of another woman, gave birth to a child which died immediately. The dead body was left on the spot where the birth took place and was there discovered two or three days afterwards. It was held that the mere leaving of the body where the birth took place did not constitute an offence under this section as it did not amount to a secret disposal.¹⁵ A woman was delivered of a child, whose dead body was found at her father's house in a bed among the feathers. There was no evidence to show who placed it there, but it being proved that the woman had sent for a surgeon at the time of her confinement, and had prepared child's clothes, the Court directed an acquittal on a charge of endeavouring to conceal the birth.¹⁶

'Child.'—Under this section it is sufficient to show that a 'child' was born and that it was sufficiently developed to have lived if born alive.¹⁷

Concealment of the birth of a foetus four months old is no offence¹⁸; but if the foetus is six¹⁹ or seven²⁰ months old its concealment is an offence. "This offence cannot be committed unless the child had arrived at that stage of maturity at the time of birth, that it might have been a living child. It is not necessary that it should have been born alive, but it must have reached a period when, but for some accidental circumstances, such as disease on the part of itself or of its mother, it might have been born alive. There is no law which compels a woman to proclaim her own want of chastity, and if she had miscarried at a time when the foetus was but a few months old, and therefore could have had no chance of life, you could not convict her upon this charge. No specific limit can be assigned to the period when the chance of life begins, but it may, perhaps, be safely assumed that under seven months the great probability is that the child would not be born alive."²¹ But in a later case it has been laid down that the word 'child' is not to be limited to a child likely to live or likely to die, but that as soon as the foetus has the outward appearance of a child it is sufficient. A foetus not bigger than a man's finger, but having the shape of a child was, therefore, held to be a 'child.'²²

2. 'Whether such child die before or after...its birth.'—The offence under this section is in respect of concealment of birth by a secret disposal of the dead body of a child. It is, therefore, not material when such child died.

3. 'Intentionally conceals or endeavours to conceal the birth.'—The section applies only where one intentionally conceals the birth of a child from the world at large. Mere omission to publish the fact of the birth of concealment from a desire to escape individual observation or anger does not make the section applicable.²³ The offence becomes complete when the birth, i.e., the delivery of a child dead or living is concealed by any means.²⁴ The endeavour to conceal the birth of a child by a secret disposition of the dead body must be by putting it into some place where it is not likely to be found. Placing it in an open box in the accused's bed-room, and afterwards, on inquiry by the medical man, informing him that the child was in the box where it was found, was held to be not a secret disposition.²⁵ The evidence of a secret disposition consists in the situation in which the body is placed.¹ If any concealment or disposition of the dead body of a child is made, it does not matter whether it be final or temporary.² Where, therefore, a woman placed the dead body of a child between a bed and a mattress,³ or placed it upon her bed and covered it over with a petticoat,⁴ it was held that this offence was not committed. If a woman causes the body of her child to be secretly buried with a view to conceal the birth, the offence is complete even though she may have previously allowed the birth to be known to some other persons.⁵

Abetment.—Where the accused gave her new-born illegitimate dead child to a woman with instructions to dispose of it secretly, and the latter carried out the instructions by throwing it into a river, it was held that the accused was not guilty of the substantive offence under this section, though the facts more appropriately came under the definition of abetment.⁶

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the birth of the child.

(2) That the child died either before, during, or after, its birth.

(3) That the accused buried or otherwise disposed of the dead body.

The accused should have done some act of disposal of the body after the child was dead.⁷ The dead body must be found, and identified as that of the child of which she is alleged to have been delivered.⁸

(4) That such burial or disposal of the body was secretly done.

(5) That the accused thereby intentionally concealed, or endeavoured to conceal, the birth of such child.

Mere proof that a woman was delivered of a child and allowed two others to take away its body is insufficient to sustain an indictment against her for concealment of birth.⁹

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first class.

Unless there is clear evidence of murder against a person secretly disposing of the dead body of a child, which is found to have been killed after its birth, such person should not be charged and tried for murder but must be convicted under this section for concealing the birth of the child.¹⁰

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, by secretly burying (if any other mode adopted specify that mode) the dead body of a certain child, to wit—, the child of AB, intentionally concealed (or endeavoured to conceal) the birth of the said child, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 318 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance [or within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court)]].

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

a limb, the flinging of boiling water over a person, are assaults, and are also acts which cause bodily hurt. But bodily hurt may be caused by many acts which are not assaults. A person, for example, who mixes a deleterious potion, and places it on the table of another; a person who conceals a scythe in the grass on which another is in the habit of walking; a person who digs a pit in a public path, intending that another may fall into it, may cause serious hurt, and may be justly punished for causing such hurt; but they cannot, without extreme violence to language, be said to have committed assault. We propose to designate all pain, disease and infirmity by the name of hurt."¹¹

"The definition of hurt...appears to contemplate the causing of pain, etc., by one person to another."¹² There is nothing in the definition of hurt to suggest that the hurt should be caused by direct physical contact between the accused and his victim. Where serious mental derangement is caused by some voluntary act, a hurt is caused. Where the accused suddenly confronted the complainant's wife at night time in the dark and uttered a piercing shout and extended his arm pointing a pistol at her and the woman collapsed from nervous shock, it was held that the accused must be presumed to have intended to cause hurt or to have known it likely that hurt would be caused. The duration of the state of mental infirmity would be immaterial.¹³

Acts neither intended nor likely to cause death amount to hurt or grievous hurt according to the nature of injury caused even though death has resulted therefrom.

1. 'Bodily pain.'—Harm so slight, that no person of ordinary sense and temper would complain of it, is excluded by s. 95. Severe bodily pain will fall within the definition, no matter whatever may be the duration of such pain. Where a bailiff proceeded to a house, and on the occupant's wife refusing to vacate it, pulled or dragged her out of the house, and the force used for the purpose caused her, when released, to fall on the ground whereby she received slight injuries, it was held that he was legally justified in the employment of such amount of force and could not be convicted therefor under s. 323.¹⁴ The accused went with the Naib Nazir of a Court to execute a decree for ejectment from a house which they had obtained against their sister's husband. Delivery of possession was resisted by the accused's sister, the complainant, on the ground that the house belonged to her and she was not a party to the decree. The accused forcibly dragged the complainant out of the house. It was held that as she was no party to the decree for ejectment the accused were guilty under s. 323.¹⁵ The accused quarrelled with his wife and caused hurt to her by giving a blow with a stick. The Sessions Judge acquitted him on the ground that the husband had the right to beat his wife for impudence or impertinence, but the High Court held that no such right was recognised by the Penal Code.¹⁶

2. 'Infirmity.'—This term has been defined as "inability of an organ to perform its normal function which may either be temporary or permanent."¹⁷

Infirmity denotes an unsound or unhealthy state of the body or mind. A state of temporary impairment or hysteria or terror would constitute infirmity.¹⁸

3. 'To any person.'—That is, any other person but himself.¹⁹

Act neither intended nor likely to cause death is hurt even though death is caused.—Where there is no intention to cause death or no knowledge that death is likely to be caused from the harm inflicted, and death is caused, the accused would be guilty of hurt only if the injury caused was not serious. Where the accused with a view to chastising her daughter, eight or ten years old, for impertinence, gave her a kick on the back and two slaps on the face, the result of which was death,²⁰ where the accused, taking offence at an insult offered him by his companion in a drunken brawl, threw him down upon the ground, and stamped his feet upon him, which caused his death within twenty days;²¹ and where the accused threw his stick at the deceased with such force that it hit the deceased on the head and made a punctured wound which caused his death,²² it was held that the offence committed amounted to voluntarily causing hurt. Where an accused person had struck a man one blow on the head with a bamboo yoke and the injured man died afterwards in a hospital principally from excessive use of opium surreptitiously administered by his friends, it was held that the offence committed was that of voluntarily causing hurt as there was no intention to cause death and the blow in itself was not of such a nature as was likely to cause death.²³ The accused, after a trivial domestic quarrel, beat his wife with a light stick, with the result that she fell down and expired. The medical evidence showed that the deceased was a thin and poorly developed woman; that her brain was anæmic, but otherwise all the internal organs were healthy and uninjured; no bones were broken; but there were many bruises on the body, and death had been due to shock. It was held that as all the physical injuries sustained by the deceased were simple hurts, the accused should be convicted of an offence under this section as he could not have known that his wife's brain was anæmic, or that the shock of a severe beating would prove fatal to her.²⁴ Where in a sudden fight between G, S and M on one side, and D, R and I on the other, for which G on his side and D on the other side were chiefly to blame and in which blows of ordinary sticks and of fists were exchanged and one of the latter party took up a heavy piece of wood close by and gave a severe blow on the head of G which fractured his skull bone and ultimately resulted in his death; but it was neither proved who gave the blow nor was there any indication that any member of that party intended or knew it to be likely that any such serious injury would be caused, it was held that the members of the latter party were only responsible for simple hurt under s. 323.²⁵ Where the deceased was dragged from his house and kicked by the accused and death was due to asphyxia as the result of strangulation and there was no motive, or prior enmity between the parties and the intention was found to be only to cause hurt, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under s. 304 but were guilty under s. 323.¹ Where, on K being assaulted by B, a number of persons rushed to the scene and a fracas occurred in which B was killed, and K and the other persons forming the assembly were convicted under s. 147 and some of them under s. 323, it was held that the convictions under s. 147 were not sustainable, the common object of the crowd being to rescue K and not to assault B; that in so far as excessive force had been used by some members of the assembly the users of such force were liable to be punished for the assaults committed by them, and not the other members of the assembly; and that in the absence of proof as to who actually dealt the fatal blow to B no member of the assembly was punishable in respect of that blow.²

For further cases in which the act of the accused amounted to grievous hurt see p. 808.

Poisoning.—The accused, a boy of about sixteen years of age, being in love with a girl some three or four years younger, and apparently intending to administer to her something in the nature of a love philtre, induced another boy younger than himself to give the girl some peras (sweetmeat). The girl and some of the other members of her family ate the peras and all the persons who partook of them were seized with more or less violent symptoms of dhatūra poisoning, though none of them died. There was no evidence to show that the boy who actually handed over the peras knew that they contained anything harmful. It was held that the accused was guilty of hurt.³

Spleen cases.—Where a woman died from a chance kick in the spleen, not known to be diseased, inflicted by her husband on provocation, and the husband had no intention or knowledge that the act was likely to cause hurt, endangering human life, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section and s. 321.⁴ Where the accused beat and kicked the deceased whereby the deceased's spleen, which was in a diseased condition, was ruptured and he died;⁵ where the accused kicked a punkha-puller who had an enlarged spleen which was not known to the accused, and death ensued;⁶ and where the accused caused the death of another person by throwing a piece of brick at him which struck him in the region of the spleen and ruptured it, the spleen being diseased,⁷ it was held that as the accused had not the intention to cause death, or to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, the offence committed was that of voluntarily causing hurt.

Death due to weak condition.—The injury inflicted with a dah by the accused on the deceased was not such as to entail serious consequences to a person in normal health. The injured person died from an abscess in the brain, not from the injury, which had only a remote connection with the abscess. Unknown to the accused, the deceased suffered from chronic malaria which had lowered his power of resistance to infection and he had left a hospital against medical advice. It was held that the accused was guilty of simple hurt and not of culpable homicide.⁸

Cerebral hæmorrhage.—Where the accused gave a blow on the chest of the deceased, who was sixty-five years old, in the course of a quarrel, and the deceased died of cerebral hæmorrhage probably brought about by the excitement during the quarrel, the accused was found guilty of hurt and not of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.⁹

Kicking.—The accused demanded one anna from the deceased which the latter owed him. The deceased promised to pay later and the accused thereupon kicked him twice on the abdomen and the deceased collapsed and died. It was held that it could not be said that the accused intended or knew that kicking on the abdomen was likely to endanger life and that he was guilty of causing hurt.¹⁰

Hair-pulling.—Pulling of a woman by the hair was held to amount to this offence.¹¹

Stone-throwing.—Where the accused who had a quarrel with his debtor over non-discharge of a loan, pelted brick-bats at his house knowing that there were occupants in it, and hurt one of them who was under medical treatment for ten days, it was held that he was guilty of causing hurt.¹²

320. The following kinds of hurt only are designated as “grievous hurt.” :

First.—Emasculation.¹

Secondly.—Permanent privation of the sight of either eye.

Thirdly.—Permanent privation of the hearing of either ear.

Fourthly.—Privation of any member or joint.

Fifthly.—Destruction or permanent impairing of the powers of any member or joint.

Sixthly.—Permanent disfiguration² of the head or face.

Seventhly.—Fracture or dislocation of a bone³ or tooth.

Eighthly.—Any hurt which endangers life⁴ or which causes the sufferer to be during the space of twenty days in severe bodily pain, or unable to follow his ordinary pursuits.⁵

COMMENT.

The authors of the Code observe : "We have found it very difficult to draw a line between those bodily hurts which are serious and those which are slight. To draw such a line with perfect accuracy is, indeed, absolutely impossible; but it is far better that such a line should be drawn, though rudely, than that offences some of which approach in enormity to murder, while others are little more than frolics which a good-natured man would hardly resent, should be classed together.

"We have, therefore, designated certain kinds of hurt as grievous.

"We have given this name to emasculation,...to the fracture and to the dislocation of bones. Thus far we proceed on sure ground. But a more difficult task remains. Some hurts which are not, like those kinds of hurt which we have just mentioned, distinguished by a broad and obvious line from slight hurts, may nevertheless be most serious. A wound, for example, which neither emasculates the sufferer, nor blinds him, nor destroys his hearing, nor deprives him of a member or a joint, nor permanently deprives him of the use of a member or a joint, nor disfigures his countenance, nor breaks his bones, nor dislocates them, may yet cause intense pain, prolonged disease, lasting injury to the constitution. It is evidently desirable that the law should make a distinction between such a wound, and a scratch which is healed with a little sticking plaster. A beating, again, which does not maim the sufferer or break his bones, may be so cruel as to bring him to the point of death. Such a beating, it is clear, ought not to be confounded with a bruise, which requires only to be bathed with vinegar, and of which the traces disappear in a day."¹³

This section enumerates eight kinds of hurt as grievous. The term "main" in the English criminal law will include 'hurt.'

To make out the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt, there must be some specific hurt, voluntarily inflicted, and coming within some of the eight kinds enumerated in this section.¹⁴ Where a person forcibly thrust a lathi into the rectum of another and caused serious injuries, he was held guilty of causing grievous hurt.¹⁵

1. 'Emasculation.'—The term 'emasculation' means the depriving a person of masculine vigour, castration. Injury to the scrotum would render a man impotent. A person emasculating himself cannot be convicted under this section or under s. 309.¹⁶ A person causing grievous hurt upon his own self does not come within the purview of this section.

2. 'Disfiguration.'—The word 'disfigure' in this section means to do a man some external injury which detracts from his personal appearance, but does not weaken him as the cutting off of a man's nose or ears.¹⁷ Where a girl's cheeks were branded with a red-hot iron, which left scars of a permanent character, it was held that the disfigurement contemplated by this section was caused.¹⁸

3. 'Fracture or dislocation of a bone.'—The fracture or dislocation of a bone is considered grievous because it causes great pain and suffering to the injured person. The bone fractured may be re-joined or the bone dislocated may be re-set, but this is immaterial so far as the offence is concerned. The primary meaning of the word "fracture" is "breaking", though it is not necessary in the case of a fracture of the skull bone that it be divided into two separate parts because it may consist merely of a crack; but if it is a crack, it must be a crack which extends from the outer surface of the skull to the inner surface.¹⁹ Where there is evidence that a bone has been cut but there is nothing whatever to indicate the extent of the cut, whether deep or a mere scratch upon the surface, it is not correct to infer from that evidence alone that grievous hurt has been caused.²⁰

Where the accused threw his wife from a window about six feet high, but the fall was broken by a weather-board fixed just below it and resulted in the fracture of the knee pan and in several small wounds, it was held that the offence committed was grievous hurt.²¹ Where the result of a joint attack by several persons on one party was a fracture of the arm of the party assaulted, the offence committed was grievous hurt and not assault.²² The accused assaulted the deceased and though they had the latter entirely at their mercy inflicted only a severe beating breaking the bones of his arms and hands. There was no evidence to prove that the accused had any intention to kill, but blood poisoning took place owing to toxic absorption from the blood and the victim died two months after the beating. It was held that the accused were guilty of causing grievous hurt.²³

4. 'Any hurt which endangers life.'—These words cannot apply to cases in which life was not merely endangered but actually taken away.²⁴ The line between culpable homicide not amounting to murder and grievous hurt is a very thin and subtle one. In the one case the injuries must be such as are likely to cause death; in the other the injuries must be such as endanger life.²⁵ A wound on the neck inflicted with a sharp-edged weapon must be considered "dangerous to life."¹ Where in the course of an altercation the accused stabbed the deceased with a knife on the left forearm, piercing the radial artery and the deceased died of hæmorrhage soon after, it was held that the accused was guilty of causing grievous hurt and, as the forearm was not a vital part of the body, he could not be found guilty of culpable homicide.²

5. 'Causes the sufferer to be during the space of twenty days in severe bodily pain, etc.'—The authors of the Code say: "After long consideration we have determined to give the name of grievous bodily hurt to all hurt which causes the sufferer to be in pain, diseased or unable to pursue his ordinary avocations, during the space of twenty days...It appears to us that the length of time during which a sufferer is in pain, diseased or incapacitated from pursuing his ordinary avocations though a defective criterion of the severity of a hurt, is still the best criterion that has ever been devised. It is a criterion which may, we think, with propriety, be employed not merely in cases where violence has been used, but in cases where hurt has been caused without any assault, as by the administration of drugs, the setting of traps, the digging of pit-falls, the placing of ropes across a road ... In apportioning the punishment, we take into consideration both the extent of the hurt and the intention of the offender."³

The Law Commissioners observe: "We cannot but think that there is reason in the exceptions taken to estimating the severity of a hurt by the time during which the sufferer is unable to follow his ordinary pursuits, as a rule which will operate unequally. The man who lives by daily labour suffers far more by being kept from his work for twenty days, than he who has independent means, and whose ordinary pursuits may be intermitted for that time without causing him any material privation. Again an injury to the right hand may in the case of a clerk keep him from his work for twenty days, which if it happened to the left hand would be of no consequence. An injury to the foot may prevent one man from following his business, in which walking is necessary, which if it happened to another man in a sedentary employment would not interrupt him at all. The proposed criterion is therefore unsatisfactory, but some criterion is necessary and it will be difficult to devise a better."⁴

The mere fact that a man has been in hospital for twenty days is not sufficient, it must be proved that during that time he was unable to follow his ordinary pursuits.⁵ An injured man may be quite capable of following his ordinary pursuits long before twenty days are over, and yet for the sake of permanent recovery or greater ease or comfort be willing to remain as a convalescent in a hospital, especially if he is fed at the public expense.⁶ A disability for twenty days constitutes grievous hurt: if it continues for fifteen days, then the offence is hurt.⁷ Where a man was so much injured that he had to go to a hospital, but left it perfectly cured on the twentieth day, it was held that that day would count as one of the twenty days during which he was unable to follow his ordinary pursuits.⁸ Where the accused caused hurt to a

Acts neither intended nor likely to cause death may amount to grievous hurt even though death is caused.—Where there is no intention to cause death or no knowledge that death is likely to be caused from the harm inflicted, and death is caused, the accused would be guilty of grievous hurt if the injury caused is of a serious nature, but not of culpable homicide.¹⁰ If the common intention of the accused and his associates by committing an assault was not to cause injury known to be likely to cause death, but to cause grievous hurt, though the combined effect of the injuries actually caused was likely to cause death, the accused is guilty of the offence of causing grievous hurt and not of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹¹ The accused who was beaten by the deceased on the previous day came across the deceased by chance and gave him a blow on the back of the head with a hockey stick which he had in his hand at the time and ran away. The blow did not fell the deceased. It was held that the offence committed by the accused was grievous hurt because it would not be safe to hold that he intended to do more than cause grievous hurt.¹² Where the accused threw a stone and caused death in a sudden and unpremeditated fight,¹³ where during the course of a drunken brawl the accused gave the deceased only one blow which ultimately resulted in his death,¹⁴ it was held that the offence of grievous hurt was committed.

Three men armed with sticks attacked an unarmed man and inflicted injuries which resulted shortly afterwards in his death. The accused intended to give a thrashing to the deceased but did not intend to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as they knew was likely to cause death. It was held that they were guilty of an offence under s. 326.¹⁶ Where B, C and D came up after A had knocked the deceased down with a fatal blow on the head fracturing the skull, and B, C and D thrust a lathi into the deceased's anus and the consequent injury to the rectum was not the cause of death but that it created shock which contributed to the cause of death, it was held that B, C and D were guilty of grievous hurt under s. 325 and not of culpable homicide under s. 304.¹⁷

Where a man received only one blow on the head and died, and there was no evidence to show which of the two persons attacking him gave that blow, it was held that neither of the two could be convicted under s. 304 but both of them could be convicted of an offence under s. 325.¹⁸ Where three persons attacked a fourth with clubs, and one of the assailants struck a blow which fractured the skull of the person attacked and caused his death, but the evidence left it in doubt as to which of the three assailants struck that blow, and there was no common intention to cause death or grievous hurt, it was held that the offence of which the three assailants were guilty was grievous hurt rather than culpable homicide not amounting to murder.¹⁹ Where three accused persons assaulted the deceased, and gave him a beating, in the course of which one of the accused struck the deceased a blow on the head, which resulted in death, it was held that, in the absence of proof that the accused had the common intention to inflict injury likely to cause death, they could not be convicted of murder.²⁰ But if two or more persons combine in injuring another in such a manner that each person engaged in causing the injury must know that the result of such injury may be the death of the injured person, it is no answer on the part of any one of them to allege that his individual act did not cause death, and that by his individual act he cannot be held to have intended death.²¹ Where the accused could not have known that they were inflicting such injuries as would be likely to cause death, and the injuries were not directly responsible for the death, but death was caused by blood poisoning,²² or hæmorrhage²³ it was held that the accused were guilty under s. 325 and not s. 304.

In connection with the marriage of the accused with one I, a certain ceremony was to be performed on a certain date. On the day so fixed, the accused found N taking I away from her village and when he remonstrated with her she told him that the ceremony would not take place on that day and abused him. The accused thereupon attacked the woman with a pen-knife and inflicted one injury on each of them in the abdomen, as the result of which N died but I survived. It was held that there was a very strong presumption that the accused neither intended to cause death nor such bodily injury as he knew to be likely to cause death, but that he intended to cause grievous hurt to the woman, and was therefore guilty of an offence under s. 326.²⁴

The accused beat the deceased to death by lathi blows. Individually none of the injuries was a fatal one and the deceased had died of the shock from multiple injuries which included a fracture of five ribs. Upon the evidence on record it was not possible to attribute any particular injury to any individual assailant: nor was it possible to say that any particular injury was the direct cause of his death. It was held that it was not safe to convict the accused of an offence under s. 302, and only a conviction of grievous hurt was possible.²⁵ There was an exchange of words between the accused, seven in number, and the deceased. The accused attacked the deceased with the intention of beating him. The deceased received two incised trivial wounds and three contused wounds. There was no medical evidence as to the cause of the death. It was held that the accused could not be convicted of culpable homicide but were guilty of grievous hurt.¹ Where the common intention of a party of men was to give a beating with lathis to another and one of them actually committed murder, though the act of murder might have been done with the aid of the other members of the party it could not be said as a probable consequence of the abetment on their part and they were guilty only of abetment of an offence under section 325, and not murder.² Where the only intention of the accused who was convicted for the offence of murder was to steal the jewels of the deceased and the only violence which he committed, viz., cutting the nostrils of the deceased, was necessary in order to facilitate the theft and the death of the deceased was entirely unexpected, it was held that the conviction of the accused for the offence of murder could not be sustained and that he was guilty of the offence of causing grievous hurt.³

Diseased spleen or heart.—Where the accused pulling the deceased out of a cot, kicked him, and struck him on the side or on the ribs with a stick, whereby the deceased, whose spleen was diseased, died, it was held that he had committed the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt.⁴ Where the accused in order to rescue his cattle which were impounded by the deceased gave him a sound beating for his refusal to surrender the cattle and the deceased, an old man of sixty, who was suffering from an enlarged heart, succumbed, it was held that the accused having no knowledge of the condition of the deceased was guilty of causing grievous hurt only.⁵

Blow aimed at one person falling upon another.—The accused struck a woman, carrying an infant in her arms, violently over her head and shoulders. One of the blows fell on the child's head, causing death. It was held that the accused committed hurt on the infant under circumstances of sufficient aggravation to bring the offence within the definition of grievous hurt.⁶ In the course of an affray severe injuries were inflicted and suffered by both sides. On the side of the complainants there was a girl of tender years who was sitting very close to her father and she received a severe blow on the head which subsequently resulted in her death. It was held that the accused were guilty of causing grievous hurt.⁷ In the course of an altercation between the accused and the complainant on a dark night, the former aimed a blow with his stick at the head of the latter. To ward off the blow, the complainant's wife, who had a child on her arm, intervened. The blow missed its aim, but fell on the head of the child causing severe injuries, from the effects of which it died. The accused was convicted of causing grievous hurt. It was held that, inasmuch as the blow, if it had reached the complainant, would have caused simple hurt, the accused was guilty of simple hurt only.⁸ The accused attempted to enter a house in order to beat the owner of the house. The latter's wife, who was carrying her infant in her arms, tried to bar accused's passage by shutting the door. The accused forced open the door and aimed a blow with a club at her but it struck the child and killed it. It was too dark for the accused to have perceived that the woman was carrying a child. It was held that the accused could only be convicted of the offence of striking the woman and that inasmuch as the accused used a club and struck the blow with some force he intended to cause grievous hurt.⁹

Death caused in course of mutual stone-throwing.—As the result of a long-standing enmity and after a fresh altercation, two parties encountered and hurled stones at each other. A member of one of the parties was struck by a stone of considerable weight and thrown with a good deal of violence, which ruptured his liver and immediately caused his death. As he fell down and lay on the ground, the accused, a man from the other party, caused a serious wound in his leg with a sword. It was held that the accused was not guilty of murder, as there could be no intention to kill, for the stone-throwing by his party was resorted to by way of defence to a similar act by the other party and the causing of death in stone-throwing was an unusual incident which could not be regarded as likely to result in injuries which caused death in the ordinary course of nature and that in causing the wound by a sword the accused was guilty of inflicting grievous hurt.¹⁰

Abetment of grievous hurt.—D was killed by one blow on his head with a sharp weapon. It was found that the accused B and M with others armed with weapons had invaded the compound where D was sleeping, that they had immediately assaulted D and that M had struck him on the head and killed him. The intention of the accused was to insult and disgrace one Mussammat K. M was held guilty under s. 302; but as both the accused had armed themselves with deadly weapons B must have known that in case of opposition the weapons would be used and in all probability grievous hurt would be caused. He was, therefore, held guilty of abetment of grievous hurt.¹¹

321. Whoever does any act with the intention of thereby causing hurt to any person, or with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause hurt to any person, and does thereby cause hurt to any person, is said “voluntarily to cause hurt”.

322. Whoever voluntarily causes hurt, if the hurt which he intends to cause or knows himself to be likely to cause is grievous hurt, and if the hurt which he causes is grievous hurt, is said “voluntarily to cause grievous hurt”.

Explanation.—A person is not said voluntarily to cause grievous hurt except when he both causes grievous hurt and intends or knows himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt. But he is said voluntarily to cause grievous hurt if, intending or knowing himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt of one kind, he actually causes grievous hurt of another kind.

ILLUSTRATION.

A, intending or knowing himself to be likely permanently to disfigure Z's face, gives Z a blow which does not permanently disfigure Z's face, but which causes Z to suffer severe bodily pain for the space of twenty days. A has voluntarily caused grievous hurt.

COMMENT.

The Law Commissioners observe : The Judge “is not to trouble himself with seeking for direct proof of what the offender thought was likely to happen, but is to infer it from the nature of his act, taking him to have intended grievous hurt, or at least to have contemplated grievous hurt as likely to occur, when he did what everybody knows is likely to cause grievous hurt, and the more certainly drawing this conclusion where there is evidence of previous enmity against the party who has suffered. If the act was such that nothing more than simple hurt could reasonably be thought likely to ensue from it, then although grievous hurt may unexpectedly have ensued, it would be his duty to convict the offender of simple hurt only.... judging that grievous hurt was not in his contemplation; for according to Clause 317 (this section) a person can be convicted of grievous hurt only when the result and the intention correspond, or when grievous hurt has been suffered from an act which was intended to cause grievous hurt, though it may be of a different kind.”¹²

The provisions of this section are very precise and incapable of misconstruction. A Magistrate dealing with a charge of voluntarily causing grievous hurt must consider and decide not only whether grievous hurt has not been caused but if it has been caused whether the accused intended or knew himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt. If he intended or knew himself to be likely to cause simple hurt only, he cannot be convicted under s. 325.¹³

323. Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 334, voluntarily causes hurt,¹ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

This is a general section for the punishment of voluntarily causing hurt. Sections 324, 327, 328, 329 and 330 deal with the same offence committed under certain aggravating circumstances; and ss. 334, 336 and 337 provide for punishment when there are certain mitigating circumstances.

1. 'Voluntarily causes hurt.'—See s. 321 as to the meaning of this expression.

Death of complainant whether ends complaint.—The former Chief Court of the Punjab had held that an action under this section was a personal one and came to an end on complainant's death and the right to carry on the prosecution did not survive to the legal representatives of the deceased.¹⁴ But the Lahore High Court has dissented from this view and has laid down that criminal proceedings once legally instituted, whether upon a complaint or otherwise, do not terminate or abate merely by reason of the death of the complainant or the person injured. Section 89 of the Probate and Administration Act, 1881 (corresponding with s. 306 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925), has no application to a criminal prosecution and there is nothing in the Criminal Procedure Code in support of the proposition that the death of the person injured or of the complainant, of itself, causes the proceedings to abate. It is a mistake to speak of an offence as a purely personal one.¹⁵ The Madras and the Allahabad High Courts have also held that a criminal prosecution does not abate by reason of the death of the person injured.¹⁶ The Madras High Court has laid down that where a complainant in a summons-case dies during the pendency of the case, the Magistrate should, under s. 247 of the Criminal Procedure Code, dismiss the complaint; it would be illegal for the Magistrate under the circumstances to grant an adjournment to enable the deceased complainant's son to come on the record and to proceed further with the inquiry.¹⁷

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused by his act caused bodily pain, disease, or infirmity to the complainant.

(2) That he did such act intentionally or with a knowledge that it would cause the hurt, etc.

The intent to cause hurt may be presumed from the nature of the hurt caused and the circumstances under which it was caused.¹⁸

Unless the evidence is good enough to warrant a clear finding as to the facts and as to the guilt of the accused, no conviction under this section and s. 325 can be arrived at on the ground of enmity and fight and serious injuries caused in the fight.¹⁹

Autrefois acquit.—A person tried and acquitted on a charge of using criminal force under s. 352 (which includes the offence of battery) cannot be tried, in respect of the same criminal matter, on a charge of hurt.²⁰

Private defence.—In cases of hurt or grievous hurt, the question should be considered as to who was the aggressor, and whether the offence was committed in the exercise of the right of private defence.²¹

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Summary trial.

A conviction under s. 160 on a prosecution initiated by the police is no bar to a subsequent trial under this section on a complaint laid by the party injured.²²

Committal.—Where death is caused, Magistrates should be careful not to take upon themselves to absolve accused from the grave charges of murder or culpable homicide and convict for hurt or grievous hurt, unless it is quite clear that there is no sufficient evidence to justify a commitment.²³

Punishment.—The act for which an accused person must be punished is the hurt which he intended to cause, or might be reasonably held likely to cause, by the act done, and not an unfortunate and entirely unforeseen result of that act.²⁴ Where different persons are injured, grievous hurt being caused in one case and simple hurt in others, it is competent for the Court to impose separate and accumulative sentences.²⁵

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, voluntarily caused hurt to AB, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 323 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

324. Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 334, voluntarily¹ causes hurt by means of any instrument for shooting, stabbing, or cutting, or any instrument which, used as a weapon² of offence, is likely to cause death,³ or by means of fire or any heated substance, or by means of any poison⁴ or any corrosive substance,⁵ or by means of any explosive substance, or by means of any substance which it is deleterious to the human body to inhale, to swallow, or to receive into the blood, or by means of any animal,⁶ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT

Object.—The object of this section is to make simple hurt more grave and liable to a more severe punishment where it has the ‘differentia’ of one of the modes of infliction described in the section.¹

The authors of the Code say : “Bodily hurt may be inflicted by means the use of which generally indicates great malignity. A blow with the fist may cause as much pain, and produce as lasting injury, as laceration with a knife, or branding with a hot iron. But it will scarcely be disputed that, in the vast majority of cases, the offender who has used a knife or a hot iron for the purpose of wreaking his hatred is a far worse and more dangerous member of society than he who has only used his fist. It appears to us that many hurts which would not, according to our classification, be designated as grievous, ought yet, on account of the mode in which they are inflicted, to be punished more severely than many grievous hurts.”²

1. ‘Voluntarily.’—See s. 39, supra.

2. ‘Weapon.’—It is not necessary that the manner of use of the weapon must be such as is likely to cause death. Such an element would compose a crime of a wholly different character.³ It is merely the nature of the instrument that should be taken into consideration.⁴ Where the injury caused is simple but is caused with a cutting weapon, this section applies.⁵ Where the accused fired a loaded pistol into a group of persons among whom was A, without aiming at A or anyone in particular, but intending generally to do grievous bodily harm, and wounded A, it was held that he had committed this offence.⁶

3. ‘Likely to cause death.’—The instrument must be one, not which is ‘liable’ but which is ‘likely’ to cause death. It must be one of which one can predicate that the probable result of its use will be by virtue of its very nature, death. It must be inherent in the nature of the instrument used that death is likely to ensue. Where the injury results from a blow with a bamboo stick, s. 323 applies.⁷

4. 'Poison.'—Poison is "that which when administered is injurious to health or life."⁸ "If the thing administered is a recognised poison the offence may be committed, though the quantity given is so small as to be incapable of doing harm."⁹ A person who administers that which is a poison is guilty, although by ignorance or mistake he happens to administer it in a form which renders it innocuous. Where, therefore, the accused, with intent to kill, administered to a child nine weeks old, two poisonous berries but the child did not die because the poisonous property of the berries resided in the kernel which was enclosed in a pod so hard that it could not be digested by a child of that age, it was held that he was guilty of the offence of administering poison with intent to kill.¹⁰ Under the Code this will amount to attempt to murder.

5. 'Corrosive substance.'—The term "corrosive substance" means any substance which irritates the system, e.g., sulphuric acid, corrosive sublimate, etc.

6. 'Animal.'—See s. 47, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused by his act bodily pain, disease, or infirmity to the complainant.

(2) That he did such act intentionally or with a knowledge that it would cause the hurt, etc.

(3) That it was unprovoked.

(4) That the accused caused it by means of an instrument for shooting, stabbing or cutting; or by an instrument, used as a weapon likely to cause death; or by means of fire, etc.; or by means of any poison, etc.; or by means of any substance which is deleterious to the human body to inhale, etc., or by means of any animal.

Where the accused had caused hurt in exercise of the right of private defence the burden is on him to show that he had such a right.¹¹

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable when permission is given by the Court before which a prosecution is pending—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Alternative charge.—Where the accused were charged under s. 148 of rioting armed with deadly weapons, and also under s. 324 of voluntarily causing hurt by dangerous weapons, it was held that they should have been sentenced only under one or other of these sections, the charges being, properly speaking, only alternative charges¹²

Punishment.—On a conviction for offences under ss. 324, 325 and 326, it is improper to give one sentence for all the offences, but if the cumulative sentence passed is such that it could be passed by the Magistrate in respect of any of the offences, there is no ground for interference in revision.¹³

Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

Lower Burma Rule.—Deterrent sentences must be passed in cases in which hurt is caused by a knife or other deadly weapon.¹⁴

See the Frontier Crimes Regulation,¹⁵ ss. 6, 11 (3) (d) and 12 (2); and the Criminal Tribes Act,¹⁶ s. 23.

Charge.—The charge should state that the weapon used was one of the kinds mentioned in the section.¹⁷ Merely describing it as a 'dangerous weapon' is not sufficient.¹⁸

The charge should run as follows:—

Punishment for voluntarily causing grievous hurt.

COMMENT.

1. 'Voluntarily causes grievous hurt.'—See s. 322 as to the meaning of this expression.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused hurt of any of the kinds described in s. 320.¹⁹

(2) That the accused intended, or knew that he was likely, to cause grievous hurt of any kind so described.²⁰

(3) That the accused did so voluntarily.²¹

In cases of hurt, it is the duty of the Magistrate to come to a finding of his own as to whether the hurt was grievous or simple, and for this purpose to examine the medical officer to ascertain whether the injuries are of any of the kinds specified in s. 320. It is not the business of the medical officer to classify a hurt as grievous or simple, but to describe facts, from which the Magistrate will decide whether the hurt is grievous or not.²²

It is not necessary to prove that the accused struck the complainant so severely as to endanger the latter's life.²³ But a violent blow inflicted upon the body would indicate an intention of causing grievous hurt.²⁴

Where there is no evidence to indicate as to which of the accused persons actually caused the grievous hurt none of them could be convicted under this section. It may be presumed from the conduct of several persons striking another with lathis that each of them intended to cause grievous hurt but such a presumption alone is not sufficient to establish the offence of causing grievous hurt against an accused unless it is further shown that the accused actually caused grievous hurt.²⁵

In the course of a disturbance two injuries were caused to a person, one of them grievous, and it was not possible to say which of the accused caused that injury. It was held that neither of them could be convicted under this section and both of them should be convicted only under s. 323.¹

Private defence.—In cases of grievous hurt, the question should be considered as to who was the aggressor, and whether the offence was committed in the exercise of the right of private defence,² and it would lie on the accused to show that he did not exceed that right.³

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable when permission is given by the Court before which a prosecution is pending—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Committal.—Where death is caused by the accused's violence, the Magistrate is bound to send the case to the Sessions Court.⁴

Charge.—The charge should state that the hurt was caused 'voluntarily', and not 'willingly'.⁵

The charge should run as follows :—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, voluntarily caused grievous hurt to——, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 325 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.⁶

Punishment.—Where a person is convicted under this section of causing grievous hurt there must be a sentence of imprisonment whether a fine is imposed or not.⁷ For a case of a petty character under this section, a sentence of fine without any term of imprisonment, though irregular, is adequate punishment. And the High Court will not interfere in revision notwithstanding the irregularity of the sentence, as the revisional powers are intended for the redress of genuine grievances and not a mere formal defect.⁸ See the Whipping (Burma Amendment) Act (Burma Act VIII of 1927), s. 3, as to punishment to be inflicted by Courts in Burma.

Where the grievous injury is of a minor nature, e.g., fracture of a metacarpal bone in the right hand and is detected only four or five days after its infliction a severe sentence is not called for.⁹

Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

326. Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 335.

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt by dangerous weapons or means.

voluntarily causes grievous hurt by means of any instrument for shooting, stabbing, or cutting, or any instrument which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, or by means of fire or any heated substance, or by means of any poison or any corrosive substance, or by means of any explosive substance, or by means of any substance which it is deleterious to the human body to inhale, to swallow, or to receive into the blood, or by means of any animal, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

This section applies only to the person who does a substantive act himself, namely, inflicts a blow which causes grievous hurt as defined in the Code.¹⁰ The weapon used must be a deadly one and the hurt intended or known to be likely to be caused should be grievous. Where A urged B to attack C, and B stabbed C with a knife, but there was no proof that B had the knife in his hand at the time of A's urging him on, or that A knew in any other way that B would be likely to use a knife, it was held that A could not be convicted of abetting an offence under this section but only of abetting an assault.¹¹ Where the injury attributable to the blow caused by an accused was not serious and grievous hurt was caused as the result of the cumulative injuries inflicted by all the assailants, it was held that the accused could not be held guilty under this section.¹²

The relationship between this section and the preceding one is the same as that between s. 324 and s. 323. Where several accused struck the deceased blows, one of which only was fatal, and it was not found who struck the fatal blow, it was held that, in the circumstances, it could not be said that those who did not strike the fatal blow contemplated the likelihood of such a blow being struck by the others in prosecution of the common object, and that they were all guilty under this section and not under s. 302.¹³ Four persons assembled together, three of them armed with spears, with the intention of attacking another party of men. One of them gave only one blow with a spear on a fleshy part of the body of one of his opponents. It was held that such injury was not necessarily fatal and he was guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁴ The accused struck one blow with a takwa on the head of the deceased from whom provocation had proceeded. No further advantage was taken of the fallen man. The injury was not by itself dangerous to life. The deceased died of septicaemia long after the wound was inflicted. It was held that the offence fell under this section.¹⁵ The accused fired a gun at point-blank range at the upper portion of the thigh of his victim causing a serious injury. The deceased was not killed outright but dysentery and festering of the wound supervened and he died after a couple of months. It was held that the offence committed fell under this section.¹⁶ The accused was attacked by father and son and he in return attacked both the father and son causing injuries which in the case of the father proved fatal. The doctor's opinion was that timely medical aid would have prevented the father's death. It was held that the offence of the accused fell under this section and sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment was sufficient.¹⁷ The accused were hillmen and three of them were devil dancers who attempted, at one C's request or at any rate with his consent, to dispossess C's wife of a devil by applying a hot ladle to her mouth and throat and to various parts of her body, with the result that she died. C subsequently became frightened and buried the body of his wife. It was held that this section and not s. 304A applied, and that the hurt was grievous because it endangered life.¹⁸ A fight took place between the accused and another person on one side and two other persons on the other. The deceased came and intervened. The accused had a spear in his hand and by accident he stabbed the deceased while he was separating the persons who were fighting with one another. It was held that he was guilty under this section and not under s. 304A.¹⁹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the causing of grievous hurt by the accused.²⁰

(2) That it was caused voluntarily.²¹

(3) That the accused received no provocation for the same.

(4) That such grievous hurt was caused by means of an instrument for shooting, etc., or by means of any instrument which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death; or by means of fire, etc., or by means of any poison, etc., or by means of any substance which it is deleterious to the human body to inhale, etc., or by means of any animal.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

Charge under ss. 326 and 149, but conviction under s. 326.—A full bench of the Madras High Court has held, differing from the Calcutta High Court, that when a charge has been framed under ss. 326 and 149, a conviction under s. 326 is not necessarily bad. Whether the conviction is bad or not depends upon whether the accused has or has not been materially prejudiced by the form of the charge.²²

Evidence of medical man necessary.—In all cases of voluntarily causing grievous hurt the evidence of the medical officer who examined and attended on the person to whom the hurt was caused should, if obtainable without unreasonable expense or delay, invariably be taken.²³

Punishment for nose-cutting.—The accused was tried by a Presidency Magistrate on a charge of voluntarily causing grievous hurt by cutting off with a penknife the whole of the soft part of a woman's nose and a portion of her upper lip, and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for two years. The High Court, quashing the conviction and sentence, held that the offence of which the accused was convicted being one punishable with transportation for life, or rigorous imprisonment for ten years, the Magistrate ought to have committed the accused for trial to the High Court. The case was afterwards committed to the Court of Session and the accused was sentenced to eight years' rigorous imprisonment.²⁴ The amount of punishment for cutting off a wife's nose for intriguing with another man depends on the time of the commission of the grievous hurt, whether at the instant, or long after the husband found himself dishonoured.²⁵ Where the accused was convicted of cutting his wife's nose under grave and sudden provocation and was sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for four months, the High Court enhanced the sentence to two years' rigorous imprisonment as there was a deliberate design on the part of the accused.¹ Where the accused suspecting his wife of immorality cut off her nose with an axe, and she straightaway went to a well and ended her life by jumping into it, the sentence of four months' rigorous imprisonment was enhanced to two years.² Where a mistress refused to accompany her paramour, who got enraged and bit off the tip of her nose and dislocated one of her teeth, a sentence of two months' rigorous imprisonment was enhanced to one of fourteen months.³ Where the accused suspecting his wife of immorality abandoned her, and later finding her in a field the accused's brother pulled her down and sat upon her and the accused cut off her nose with a sickle, the sentence was enhanced from one year's rigorous imprisonment to two years.⁴ Beaumont, C. J., observed: "Offences of this nature against women are to be severely discouraged." The Chief Court of Sind in a nose-cutting case enhanced the sentence of one year's imprisonment to two years even after the accused had undergone the imprisonment of one year and was released, he was sent back to prison.⁵ Cases of nose-cutting involve an act which imports deliberate design of a particularly brutal and cruel character, and therefore they must be adequately dealt with.⁶ See the Burma Laws Act, 1898, s. 1.

Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

Burma circular (1).—The attention of Magistrates is called to the advisability of passing really deterrent sentences in cases in which hurt is caused by a knife or other deadly weapon. The use of knives on the slightest provocation, and often without any provocation at all, is far too frequent in this province. The most likely method of suppressing this dangerous practice is to make the punishment severe and certain. Many cases of this kind have come to the notice of the Hon'ble Judges in which inadequate sentences have been passed.⁷

(2) Where an accused is sent up for trial under s. 326, Indian Penal Code, for causing grievous hurt with a deadly weapon, a reference should always be made to the District Magistrate, in order that he may, if he thinks fit, try the case in exercise of his special powers or transfer it to a Special Power Magistrate for trial. Many cases of this kind are hardly distinguishable from attempts to murder, punishable under s. 307 of the Penal Code. Magistrates, other than the District Magistrate or a

Magistrate specially empowered under s. 30, can rarely impose a sufficiently severe sentence in these cases.⁸

Charge.—See the remarks under the heading ‘Charge’ in s. 324, supra.

327. Whoever voluntarily¹ causes hurt, for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer, or from any person interested in the sufferer,² any property or valuable security,³ or of constraining⁴ the sufferer or any person interested in such sufferer to do anything which is illegal,⁵ or which may facilitate the commission of an offence⁶, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

This section applies not only in cases of execrable cruelties which are committed by robbers, dacoits, etc., for the purpose of extorting property, or information relating to property, but to all cases in which the hurt is caused for the purpose of extorting, or compelling, against the sufferer’s consent, the delivery of property, notwithstanding that the offender may have a valid claim or title to such property.

1. ‘Voluntarily.’—See s. 39, supra.

2. ‘Person interested in the sufferer.’—Any tie of blood relationship, marriage, service, or even friendship, seems sufficient. The Court must ascertain for what purpose the suffering was caused, whether it was directed wholly at the sufferer or at another through him.⁹

3. ‘Valuable security.’—See s. 30, supra.

4. ‘Constraining.’—This word seems to have been inserted with a view to make this section applicable to all cases where, if ‘extortion’ could not be proved, a compelling or constraining against the sufferer’s consent would equally be an offence.

5. ‘Illegal.’—See s. 44, supra.

6. ‘Offence.’—The word ‘offence’ here denotes a thing punishable under this Code or under any special or local law (s. 40).

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused hurt.¹⁰

(2) That the accused caused such hurt in order to extort from the sufferer, or person interested in him, some property or valuable security; or that the accused caused such hurt in order to constrain the sufferer, or a person interested in him, to do something illegal, or to facilitate the commission of an offence.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, voluntarily caused hurt to AB for the purpose of extorting from the said AB [or from a certain person interested in the said AB], to wit—, a certain property, to wit—, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 327 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session [or the High Court].

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Punishment.—See the Criminal Tribes Act (II of 1897), s. 6, and the Burma Laws Act, 1898, s. 4.

328. Whoever administers to or causes to be taken by¹ any person² any poison or any stupefying, intoxicating or unwholesome drug, or other thing³ with intent to cause hurt to such person, or with intent to commit or to facilitate the commission of an offence⁴ or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause hurt, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Causing hurt by means of poison, etc., with intent to commit an offence.

COMMENT.

This section is merely an extension of the provisions of s. 324. Under s. 324 actual causing of hurt is essential.

The offence under this section is complete even if no hurt is caused to the person to whom the poison or any other stupefying, intoxicating, or unwholesome drug is administered.

1. 'Administers to or causes to be taken by'.—The word 'administers' and the expression 'causes to be taken' are used to include every possible case of taking an unwholesome drug. Mere procuring or supplying a poisonous drug at the instigation of a person who wishes to take it does not amount to the offence of administering it.¹¹ At the same time to constitute administering, it is not necessary that the poison should be delivered by the hand of the party.¹² If a servant put poison into a coffee-pot which contains coffee, and, when her mistress comes down to breakfast, the servant tells the mistress that she has put the coffee-pot there for her breakfast, and the mistress drinks the poisoned coffee, this will amount to 'administering' poison.

Putting poison in a place where it is likely to be found and taken is an attempt to administer the poison. Where the accused purchased some "salts of sorrel" and put it in the complainant's sugar-basin, mixing it with the sugar, and the complainant subsequently put some of the mixture into his tea, but on tasting it, discovered that there was something wrong, and on investigation poison was discovered, it was held that this constituted an attempt to administer poison.¹³

One E being pregnant applied to the accused to get her something to procure miscarriage, and the accused procured a drug and gave it to the deceased. The drug was taken by E but not in the presence of the accused, and it procured miscarriage. It was held that the accused was guilty of administering and causing to be taken certain poison with intent to procure miscarriage.¹⁴

Where a deleterious drug is administered, an offence is committed under this section although life is not endangered.¹⁵ Thus, where a man administered the juice of some leaves to some villagers by way of ordeal and some of them showed symptoms of poison,¹⁶ and where the accused administered powder of dhatūra to a woman and robbed her of her jewellery while she was senseless,¹⁷ this offence was held to have been committed. Where, for the purpose of facilitating robbery, dhatūra was administered by two persons to certain travellers, in consequence of which one of the travellers died and others were made seriously ill, it was held that, in respect of the traveller who died, the offence committed was that punishable under s. 325, and, in respect of the travellers who did not die, the offence committed was that under this section.¹⁸ But in a subsequent case the same High Court, where dhatūra was administered with the object of facilitating robbery in such quantity that the person to whom it was given died in the course of a few hours, convicted the accused of murder under s. 302.¹⁹ The Bombay High Court has held likewise.²⁰

Where the death of the victim was due not to dhatūra poison found to have been administered by the accused but to pneumonia consequent upon exposure occusioned by coma or unconsciousness produced by the poison and in fact the victim died of pneumonia after recovering from dhatura poisoning, it was held that the accused ought to be convicted not under s. 302 but under this section.²¹

As dhatura can both be and is in practice frequently used by robbers without fatal results, it is necessary to show against a person accused of a purpose to commit robbery with murder something more than that he proposed to administer, or did on a particular occasion administer, dhatura in order to effect his purpose of robbery, though it may not be absolutely necessary to show that on any occasion culpable homicide amounting to murder was in fact committed.²²

Where the accused administered a drug to a female to excite her sexual passion and desire, in order that he may have sexual connection with her, it was held that he had administered an unwholesome drug.²³

2. 'Any person.'—It is not necessary that the hurt should be caused to any particular person intended, or that the person injured or likely to be injured should have been previously known. Where the accused mixed milk bush juice in his toddy pots, knowing that if drunk by a person it would cause injury, with the intention of detecting an unknown thief who was always in the habit of stealing his toddy, and the toddy was drunk by some soldiers, who purchased it from an unknown vendor, it was held that he was guilty under this section.²⁴

3. 'Or other thing.'—These words must be referred to the preceding words and be taken to mean "unwholesome or other thing" and not "other thing" simply.²⁵

4. 'With intent to cause hurt...or to facilitate the commission of an offence.'—The word 'offence' here denotes a thing punishable under this Code or under any special or local law (s. 40). If the poison or unwholesome drug is administered not with the intention of causing hurt or to commit an offence, the accused cannot be convicted under this section. Accused, a boy of sixteen years of age, having become infatuated with a girl of thirteen, persuaded another boy younger than him to make the girl eat some sweets containing dhatura, which accused wrongly believed would act as a love philtre. Evidently there was no intention on the accused's part to cause hurt to any person, but, as a result of the administration of the drug, the girl was thrown into a delirium for some time with the possible risk of falling into a coma. It was held that the offence did not fall within this section but the accused must be deemed to have had knowledge that the administering of the drug was likely to cause hurt within the meaning of s. 319.¹ Where a boy of twenty years administered dhatura to three persons at the instance of another person and the three persons suffered from the effects of the poison, but were saved by prompt measures taken by their neighbours, the Court convicted him owing to his youth under this section instead of under s. 307 on the ground that there was a probability of his becoming a fit member of society.² Where a wife, not knowing the dangerous properties of aconite powder, administered it to her husband, by mixing it with his food and in consequence the husband died, it was held that she could not be found guilty of murder, but, inasmuch as her intention was to cause bodily infirmity to her husband by depriving him of his will power and so bringing him completely under her domination, she had committed an offence under this section.³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the substance in question is a poison, or any stupefying, intoxicating, or unwholesome drug, etc.

(2) That the accused administered or caused the complainant to take such substance.

(3) That he did as above with intent to cause hurt or knowing it to be likely that he would thereby cause hurt or that the accused intended to commit or facilitate the commission of an offence.⁴

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, administered to (or caused to be taken by) AB a certain poison (or a certain stupefying, intoxicating or unwholesome drug), to wit—, with intent to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby cause) hurt to the said AB (or with intent to commit or facilitate the commission of the offence of—upon the said AB), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 328 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Punishment.—See the Criminal Tribes Act, 1897, s. 6; the Frontier Crimes Regulation, 1901, ss. 11 (3) (d) and 12(2).

COMMENT.

See Comment on s. 327, supra. This section is similar to that section, the only difference being that the hurt caused under it is grievous.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused grievous hurt.⁵

(2) That the accused caused such grievous hurt in order to extort from the sufferer, or a person interested in him, some property or valuable security; or that the accused caused such grievous hurt in order to constrain the sufferer, or a person interested in him, to do something illegal, or to facilitate the commission of an offence.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—The charge should be in the same form as that under s. 327, except that the expression 'grievous hurt' should be substituted for 'hurt.'

Punishment.—Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

COMMENT.

The offence which this section intends to describe is that of inducing a person by hurt to make a statement, or a confession, having reference to an offence or misconduct; and whether that offence or misconduct has been committed is wholly immaterial.⁶ The principal object of this section is to prevent torture by the police. But the section covers every kind of torture for whatever purpose it may be intended.

The information sought for may be required for the advancement of justice—nay more, it may be such information as cannot be withheld without offending against public justice—the property, the extortion of which is sought, may be property which the sufferer has borrowed from the offender and which he illegally refuses to give back—the claim or demand may be a just claim—but the law will not tolerate the employment of such means as are here made punishable, even when for an honest end.⁷

1. 'Voluntarily.'—See s. 39, supra.

2. 'Person interested in the sufferer.'—See s. 327, supra.

3. 'Offence.'—The word 'offence' here denotes a thing punishable under this Code, or under any special or local law (s. 40). It must be proved that the hurt to the complainant was caused with intent to extort a confession of some offence or misconduct punishable under the Code. The accused seized three women, took them to the house of one of them, and there tortured the woman by pouring hot oil over them, and otherwise ill-treating them. One of these women subsequently threw herself down a well and died. It was alleged that cholera was prevalent in the village and that the accused believing that these women practised witchcraft, tortured them for the purpose of extorting a confession that they were witches. It was held that the accused could not legally be convicted under this section, but they were guilty of hurt.⁸

Police torture.—Where the accused, a constable, during an inquiry into a theft case, violently beat the deceased, who died about nine days afterwards from the effects of the beating, it was held that he was guilty under this section.⁹ Under similar circumstances when death resulted from injuries which were of the nature of grievous hurt the accused was convicted under the next section.¹⁰

4. 'Constraining.'—See s. 327, supra.

5. 'Valuable security.'—See s. 30, supra.

6. 'Demand.'—Under this section the 'demand' must be one with respect to property. Hence, where the accused, in order to constrain his wife to return to his house, caused hurt to her, s. 324, and not this section, was held to apply.¹¹

Abetment.—Where a policeman stood by and acquiesced in an assault on a prisoner committed by another policeman for the purpose of extorting a confession, it was held that he was guilty of abetment of an offence under this section.¹²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused hurt.¹³

(2) That the accused caused such hurt in order to extort from the sufferer, or a person interested in him, a confession, or some information.¹⁴

(3) That such confession or information was required, as possibly leading to the detection of an offence, or of some misconduct.

Or prove—

(1) As above.

There must be immediate connection between the assault and the restoration of property. The intention of the person causing the assault must be proved to be to obtain from the person assaulted a confession of the restoration of property.¹⁵

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, voluntarily caused hurt to AB for the purpose of extorting from the said AB (or from a certain person interested in the said AB, to wit—) a certain confession (or information) to wit—, which might lead to the detection of the offence of—(specify the person in respect of whom, and the place where, the offence was committed), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 330 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court] on the said charge.

Punishment.—The law draws a great distinction between simple hurt caused in the ordinary way and simple hurt caused for the purpose of extorting a confession or making an accused person recover any property. The causing of hurt by a responsible police-officer engaged in the investigation of a crime is one of the most serious offences known to law and deterrent punishment should be inflicted on the offender.¹⁶

331. Whoever voluntarily causes grievous hurt for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer, or from any person interested in the sufferer, any confession or any information which may lead to the detection of an offence or misconduct, or for the purpose of constraining the sufferer or any person interested in the sufferer to restore or to cause the restoration of any property or valuable security, or to satisfy any claim or demand, or to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt to extort confession, or to compel restoration of property.

COMMENT.

See Comment on the preceding section. This section is similar to the preceding section except that the hurt caused under it should be 'grievous.'

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those required for s. 330, showing that the hurt caused was grievous hurt.¹⁷

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—See s. 330. In the charge as given under that section substitute 'grievous hurt' for 'hurt.'

332. Whoever voluntarily¹ causes hurt to any person being a public servant² in the discharge of his duty as such public servant,³ or with intent to prevent or deter that person or any other public servant from discharging his duty as such public servant, or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by that person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

The protection given by this section is not confined to public servants, but will also extend to persons acting in good faith under their directions. The public servant must be acting in the discharge of his duty as such public servant. If he was acting for his own private work no offence would be committed.¹⁸

This section resembles s. 353. Under it there is causing of hurt to the public servant: under s. 353 there is assault or criminal force for the same purpose.

1. 'Voluntarily.'—See s. 39, supra. 2. 'Public servant.'—See s. 21, supra.

3. 'In the discharge of his duty as such public servant.'—This expression means in the discharge of a duty imposed by law on such public servant in the particular case, and does not cover an act done by him in good faith under colour of his office.¹⁹ A person cannot be said to be discharging official duties merely because he is in official garb.²⁰ No official can seek the shelter of this section, where the accused has tried to resist an illegal act on his part.²¹ "A warrant", for example, "is handed to a Police-officer for the arrest of a particular person. That warrant on the face of it does not direct him to break open premises, for instance, in order to effect the arrest, and yet it may be necessary for the officer in discharge of his duty in arresting the accused under the warrant to break into the accused's house, or to do some other act without the doing of which the warrant could not be executed. Such acts would be properly described as done or attempted to be done by the Police-officer in the lawful discharge of his duty. If it was unnecessary to do such an act and yet it was done, the act would not be done by the Police-officer in the lawful discharge of his duty, and therefore would not be covered by the concluding portion of s. 332."²² Where a constable has no warrant of arrest in his possession at the time of the assault nor has he been entrusted with the duty of arresting the accused at the time when the assault was made upon him, he cannot be said to have been acting in the discharge of his duty even if he intended or wanted to arrest the accused.²³

A warrant was issued by a Magistrate for the arrest of D under s. 114 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The warrant was sent to a thana to be executed. It was there, after being copied into a book kept for that purpose at the thana, made over to a particular constable for execution. When the constable to whom the warrant had been made over had left the thana, it was discovered that D was in a village other than that in which he had been supposed to be. Thereupon the officer temporarily in charge of the thana made a copy from the book at the thana; endorsed on the back the names of one N and some other constables, and having signed the endorsement sent N and the others out with this paper to arrest D. N and his companions arrested D; but, as they were returning with him in custody, some of D's friends, aided by D himself, attacked them, rescued D, and caused hurt to the police. It was held that the police-officers concerned in arresting D under the circumstances above described were not acting in the lawful discharge of their duty within the meaning of this section so as to render the accused liable to conviction under it; but inasmuch as they were acting in good faith under colour of their office, s. 99 applied, and D and his associates might properly be convicted under ss. 147 and 323.²⁴ An Excise Inspector, in searching the house of a person, under the suspicion that he would find cocaine there, committed many irregularities. He had no warrant authorizing him to make the search, he had brought only one search witness and he had directed a constable to scale the outer wall of the house. The accused assaulted and beat him. It was held that the Inspector and the constables were not acting in the discharge of their duties as public servants and the accused were not guilty of an offence under this section, but were guilty of an offence punishable under s. 323.²⁵ Where a person is arrested for an offence not really under a warrant, the mere fact that a warrant had been issued for his arrest, which warrant had been executed against other persons who have since been convicted, can hardly be put forward as a justification for the arrest.¹ Where an order issued by a Magistrate had ceased to have effect, a constable in carrying out the order could not be said to have been acting in the discharge of a duty imposed by law on him, and no conviction could take place under this section.² If hurt is caused the accused may be convicted under s. 323. Playing cards in a street is no offence under s. 34 of the Police Act and a constable prohibiting people from playing cards in a street is not acting in the discharge of his duty. Players assaulting the constable are not guilty of an offence under this section but under s. 323.³

A police constable investigating a charge of burglary under s. 457 is empowered, under s. 54 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to arrest, without an order from a Magistrate or his superior officer, persons against whom a reasonable suspicion of having been concerned in the burglary exists, and if any of such persons resists the wish of the constable by force he is guilty of an offence under this section, if he causes hurt; or under s. 353, if an assault is simply committed and he is not protected under s. 99. But in the case of a scuffle merely a small fine is quite sufficient to meet the ends of justice.⁴ A police-officer authorized to investigate a charge of theft has a right to make a search, which is incidental to his right to investigate. In conducting the search, however, if he ignores the provisions of s. 103 of the Criminal Procedure Code and the accused offer resistance they are not guilty of an offence under this section, for the officer so resisted would not be at the time acting in the discharge of his duty.⁵ While a very evenly contested wrestling match was going on, one of the constables, who had been invited by the organizers of the show to keep peace and order and who was a backer of one of the contestants, interfered with the wrestling, with the result that a scuffle followed in which some of the policemen were hustled by the accused and their uniform torn, it was held that it was very difficult to resist rushing to the arena when a constable who was also a backer was interfering, but that, however, would not justify the action of the accused.⁶ Where the accused offered resistance and caused hurt to certain police-officers who in execution of a warrant under s. 88 of the Criminal Procedure Code attempted to dig walls to remove doors and door-frames, it was held that the police-officers were not acting legally and therefore no offence under this section was committed.⁷ On receiving information that the accused were in possession of illicit liquor, an Excise Inspector searched the house of the accused. Two constables who had been posted near the house prevented the accused from entering into the house saying that they should enter it after the search was over. On a scuffle which ensued the accused and constables received injuries. The accused were convicted under this section. It was held that the constables acted not in the discharge of their duty, which was to allow the accused to enter into the house and be present at the time of the search, but in contravention of the mandatory provisions of s. 103, Criminal Procedure Code, and were not justified in offering physical resistance when the accused attempted to go into their house and therefore this section did not apply.⁸

A police-officer helping another outside his own jurisdiction but in the same district is to be deemed to be doing his duty as a public servant, and a person obstructing such officer is punishable under this section, because under s. 11, Sch. B, of the Bombay District Police Act, 1890, police-officers of every grade are appointed to the entire district in which they have to serve, and under s. 32 of the Act a police-officer is to be deemed to be always on duty in the area to which he is appointed.⁹ But where a police constable who was not on duty went to a show and was assaulted and injured by the accused, it was held that the accused was guilty under s. 323 and not under this section.¹⁰

Where a village official was dragged to a house, was asked to make certain entries in his papers, and was beaten by the accused when he refused to do so, and it was held that the accused intended to prevent or deter the village official from discharging his duties as a public servant and were guilty under this section.¹¹ In the investigation of a case under s. 363 a Sub-Inspector went to the House of the accused and asked them to produce the kidnapped girl, and one R, who was said to have kidnapped her. The accused denied the presence of these two persons in their house, whereupon the Sub-Inspector said that he would search the house. The accused then dragged the Sub-Inspector inside the house and assaulted him. The Sub-Inspector had no warrant under s. 100, Criminal Procedure Code. It was held that the accused were guilty under this section as the Sub-Inspector was empowered under ss. 47, 48, 54 and 165. Criminal Procedure Code, to act as he did.¹²

Blow with umbrella amounts to 'hurt.'—Where a blow was struck by the accused with an umbrella to a public servant it was held that this offence was committed.¹³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused hurt.¹⁴

(2) That the person so hurt was a public servant.

(3) That such public servant was then discharging his duty as such.¹⁵

Or prove—

(1) and (2) as above, and further

(3) That the accused did so, with intent to prevent or deter such public servant or any other public servant, from discharging his duty;¹⁶ or that he did so in consequence of something done, or attempted to be done, by such public servant, in the lawful discharge of his duty.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, voluntarily caused hurt to one AB, a public servant, in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 332 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

333. Whoever voluntarily causes grievous hurt to any person being a public servant in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, or with intent to prevent or deter that person or any other public servant from discharging his duty as such public servant, or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by that person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

This section provides for the aggravated form of the offence which the preceding section deals with. The hurt caused under it must be grievous. The section contemplates three categories. First, when grievous hurt is caused while the public servant is in the discharge of his duty as such public servant : in this case motive and object are irrelevant. Secondly, when a public servant is prevented or deterred from discharging his duty as such public servant : in this case it is necessary that the object of the accused should be to deter the public servant from discharging his duty but it is not necessary to prove any motive. Thirdly, when the public servant is assaulted in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by that public servant in the discharge of his duty : in this case it is not necessary that the public servant should be discharging his duty at the time of the assault. The object, too, is irrelevant. The only thing that has got to be seen is the motive.¹⁷

See Comment on the preceding section.

Public servant must be acting in discharge of his legal duties.—Two village watchmen arrested one F on suspicion that he was in possession of stolen property. While he was being taken to the police-station he was rescued from the custody of the watchmen by certain persons. It was held that the watchmen were not members of the police force, and had no authority to arrest F on mere suspicion inasmuch as the statute whereunder they had been appointed was repealed; and that F could not be convicted under this section because it was necessary to make out that F and the actual rescuers were acting in pursuance of a common intention within the meaning of s. 34.¹⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove the same points as those for s. 332, showing that the hurt caused was grievous hurt.¹⁹

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session.

Charge.—See s. 332.

Punishment.—See the Criminal Tribes Act (II of 1897), s. 6; the Burma Laws Act (1898), s. 4.

Bombay Act LI of 1947 empowers enhanced punishment where an order of restriction or of settlement has been made (s. 19).

334 Whoever voluntarily causes hurt on grave and sudden provocation,¹ if he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause hurt to any person other than the person who gave the provocation, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

This section serves as a proviso to ss. 323 and 324.

Causing hurt on grave and sudden provocation to the person giving the provocation is chargeable as an offence under this section, and not under s. 324.²⁰

1. 'Grave and sudden provocation.'—See Comment on s. 300, Exception 1.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused bodily pain, disease, or infirmity.

(2) That it was caused when he was under grave and sudden provocation.

(3) That he neither intended nor knew it to be likely to cause it to any person other than the person who gave the provocation.

Onus.—The burden of proving sudden provocation, and that the accused neither intended nor knew that he was likely to cause hurt to any person other than the person giving the provocation, would lie on the accused.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Summary trial.

335. Whoever voluntarily causes grievous hurt on grave and sudden provocation,¹ if he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt to any person other than the person who gave the provocation, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to four years, or with fine which may extend to two thousand rupees, or with both.

Explanation.—The last two sections are subject to the same provisos as Exception 1, section 300.

COMMENT.

This section serves as a proviso to ss. 325 and 326.

1. 'Grave and sudden provocation.'—See Comment on s. 300, Exception 1. The provocation and its effects must be sudden as well as grave: and the deprivation of the power of self-control must continue in order to benefit a man who kills another under circumstances of grave provocation.²¹ If the particular act of which the accused is found guilty is one which imports deliberate design, the plea of grave and sudden provocation has not the same effect as in the case of a man who in sudden and provoked anger strikes a blow, however serious that blow may be. Thus, where the accused cut the nose of his wife with deliberate design, the High Court enhanced the sentence to two years' rigorous imprisonment though there was grave provocation.²²

Cases.—Sudden provocation.—A person who, by a single blow with a deadly weapon, killed another, entering at dead of night into a dark room where he and his wife were sleeping separately, for the purpose of having criminal intercourse with her, was held guilty of causing grievous hurt on grave and sudden provocation.²³ Where the accused gave a blow on the back of another person who was abusing the accused after he had made overtures to a woman who was related to the accused and his enlarged spleen got ruptured and he died, it was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.²⁴

Not sudden provocation.—A husband, suspecting his wife of infidelity, hid himself so as to see her with her paramour, and, having seen an improper act being committed, he came out and caused grievous hurt to the wife. It was held that assuming the provocation to be 'grave' it was not 'sudden' within the meaning of this section.²⁵

Amendment.—The word ‘voluntarily’ was inserted by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (VIII of 1882), s. 8. As to the meaning of this word see s. 39, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused caused bodily pain, disease, or infirmity.

(2) That he did so with the intention or knowledge of causing grievous hurt.

(3) That it was caused when he was under grave and sudden provocation.

(4) That he neither intended nor knew it to be likely to cause it to any person other than the person who gave the provocation.

Onus.—The onus of proving sudden provocation, etc., would, as in s. 334, lie on the accused.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable when permission is given by the Court before which a prosecution is pending—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, voluntarily caused grievous hurt to XY on grave and sudden provocation given to you by the said XY [or if the person hurt is another say so] on grave and sudden provocation given to you by AB and not intending to (or knowing it to be likely that you would thereby) cause hurt to XY], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 335 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

Punishment.—The Lahore High Court has expressed the opinion that an offence under this section should not be leniently treated and a mere sentence of fine would not meet the ends of justice. Accused, believing his wife unfaithful to him, completely severed her one ear with a razor and a portion of the other ear. He was fined Rs. 1,000. It was held that the act of the accused in deliberately taking a razor and mutilating his wife in the way he did constituted as grave a case as could well occur under this section, and a mere sentence of fine with no imprisonment especially when the accused was poor was inadequate.¹

Cases of nose-cutting involve an act which imports deliberate design of a particularly brutal and cruel character, and therefore they must be adequately dealt with.²

336. Whoever does any act¹ so rashly or negligently² as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to two hundred and fifty rupees, or with both.

Act endangering life or personal safety of others.

COMMENT.

Rash and negligent acts, which endanger human life or the personal safety of others, are punishable under this section even though no harm follows. They are additionally punishable under ss. 337 and 338 if they cause hurt or grievous hurt.

Many specific acts of rashness or negligence likely to endanger life or to cause hurt or injury are made punishable by Chapter XIV.

Object.—The provisions of this section are intended to meet cases where acts which are in themselves lawful are done so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others.

The offence punishable by this and the following two sections is the doing of an act so rashly or negligently as to put in peril the lives and safety of others, but with-cut an intention of causing hurt or any knowledge that hurt is likely to be thereby caused.³

1. 'Act.'—See s. 52, supra. The words "any act" are not limited to the meaning of "any legal act."⁴

In order to determine whether an act was done rashly or negligently, no distinction ought to be drawn between the act itself and the instrument with which it is done. The accused, of whom four were Dharmakartas of a temple, were charged with having drawn a car which was not in a good condition and to have thereby done an act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life. The Magistrate acquitted them on the ground that the rashness or negligence must relate to the act to bring it within the meaning of the section and not to the article or thing in respect of or in connection with which the act is done, because the rashness or negligence is the quality of the agent that does the act and not that of the subject of the action. The High Court disagreed with the opinion of the Magistrate and held that the real question for decision was whether the Dharmakartas had put the car into repair so as to satisfy themselves that it would be safely drawn.⁵

2. 'Rashly or negligently.'—See s. 304A, supra. The accused's house was being stoned and he fired his gun in all directions merely to frighten and prevent the persons who were throwing stones from doing so. It was held that the firing of the gun was not a rash or negligent act but a deliberate act, and, therefore, this section did not apply; and as the gun was fired to scare off the people who were throwing stones and not with the object of hitting them, no offence was committed.⁶

Act endangering personal safety of others should have been knowingly done.—A person, having a license to conduct swinging during a Hindu festival, was held not to render himself liable for this offence by allowing persons, in his absence, to swing by hooks inserted in the flesh, instead of by being attached to the pole by cloth, unless it was shown that he knew of it.⁷

The accused was the lessee of a certain temple. It appeared that on a certain day in the year pilgrims and others in large numbers visited this temple. Close by the gate leading from an outer courtyard into the inner temple there was a well which was surrounded by a masonry platform $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 feet high and the ring or the parapet of the well stood again about one foot above the platform. Early at night on the day of the congregation of pilgrims, an accident having occurred, the accused at the instance of the police-officer in charge had a light placed on or near the one-foot parapet, but at a later hour the accused had the light removed and thereafter between 1 and 2 A.M., while the people were again entering into the inner temple, a boy, who had no previous knowledge of the well and in the darkness could not see it, fell into it, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section.⁸ The accused, a taxi-cab driver, was licensed to drive, but owing to his defective eyesight, was asked to wear spectacles at the time of driving. One night, whilst he was driving without spectacles, his car collided with another; but it appeared that he was not to blame for the accident. Medical evidence showed that the defect in the eyesight of the accused was not very much and that it would not appreciably interfere with his efficiency as a driver. He was charged under s. 279 with driving his car in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life. The trying Magistrate convicted him under this section of doing an act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life. The High Court held that the accused had committed no offence under this section, inasmuch as it was not made out that if he drove his car without wearing spectacles he would be acting so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others.⁹

of defence in the house and that anybody who might be mischievously inclined might take care of his safety. It was held that such an act did not amount to an offence under this section.¹⁰

Engine-driver letting off steam near thoroughfare.—An engine-driver was taking an engine which was letting off steam, along a public thoroughfare, at a time when the traffic was exceptionally heavy and within a few yards of a large number of horses and carriages which had been parked together, in spite of warnings from the police that to do so would endanger the public safety. It was held that he was guilty of this offence though he might have believed that no danger would in fact be caused.¹¹

Throwing of stones.—The mere throwing of stones on the roof of a person's house does not amount to a criminal offence, unless it is done rashly or negligently so as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others.¹² But if a person intentionally throws a stone at a house or on a house under such circumstances that, although he does not intend to cause hurt, and does not in fact cause hurt, yet he must know that he is likely to cause hurt, he commits an offence punishable under this section.¹³ Where a priest left his temple at night and then from outside deliberately threw bricks at the temple, hoping that the Hindus of the locality would believe that the bricks came from the Mahomedan quarters, and that this would lead to a riot between the two communities, it was held that the act was a deliberate one and not a rash or negligent act.¹⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused did the act in question.

(2) That it was done rashly or negligently.

(3) That it was such as to endanger the life or personal safety of others.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

The Calcutta High Court has expressed the view that cases relating to motor car accidents must be tried without delay. It is improper to try such a case months after the incident when the accused and his witnesses might be entirely unable to reconstruct their recollection as to what had happened.¹⁵

337. Whoever causes hurt to any person by doing any act¹ so rashly or negligently² as to endanger human life, or the personal safety of others, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

COMMENT.

"Hurt may be caused involuntarily, yet culpably. There may have been no design to cause hurt, no expectation that hurt would be caused; yet there may have been a want of due care not to cause hurt."¹⁶

A party shall not be deemed to be culpable in respect of any hurt, damage or other evil consequence resulting from his act, although he did not use the utmost degree of caution that was possible, provided he used such a reasonable degree of caution for the exclusion of mischief as was appropriate to the nature of the act and the probability of danger in the particular case.¹⁷

Scope.—This section applies only to acts done without any criminal intent, apart from rashness or negligence which is its essential ingredient.¹⁸ Personal injury intentionally caused is neither a rash nor a negligent act.¹⁹

CASES.

Negligence with reference to gun.—The causing of hurt by negligence in the use of a gun falls within the purview of this section rather than of s. 286. But where all the evidence against the accused was that he went out shooting in the month of July when people were likely to be about in the fields, and that a single pellet from his gun struck a man who was sitting in a field, it was held that this was not sufficient evidence of rashness or negligence to support a conviction under this section.²⁰ Where a man fired blindly in the dark with a shot gun in the direction from which he had heard sounds coming from a distance, it was held that he could not be convicted under s. 307 but under this section.²¹

Negligence with reference to poisonous drug.—A wife administered to her husband a love potion in his food to save her from the quarrelsome tongue of her husband. The husband took ill on eating the food but subsequently recovered. The potion was prepared from dhatūra seeds by accused No. 2 who was her lover and by accused No. 3 who was his friend. It was held that the wife was guilty under this section as she administered to her husband without any care or caution a powder which she received from her lover who was at enmity with her husband; that accused No. 2 was guilty of an offence under ss. 307 and 109; and that accused No. 3 was guilty under ss. 328 and 109.²²

Rash operation.—The accused performed an operation with a pair of scissors on the lid of the complainant's eye, and stitched the wound with ordinary thread and needle. The operation was needless and performed in a primitive way without any precaution. The complainant's eyesight was damaged permanently to a certain extent. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section.²³

Negligent driving.—A person who caused hurt to the occupants of a motor car by rash or negligent driving was held liable under this section.²⁴

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points, (1), (2) and (3) as those for s. 336; and further (4) that hurt was actually caused.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable when permission is given by the Court before which a prosecution is pending—Triable by Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

338. Whoever causes grievous hurt to any person by doing any act¹ so rashly or negligently² as to endanger human life, or the personal safety of others, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENT

This section deals with grievous hurt engendered by an act done so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others. Otherwise this section is similar in terms to the last section.

controlling the motor car so as to avoid collision, the accused was held guilty of both rashness and negligence by which the accident was caused.²⁵ Failure to sound the horn by a person driving a motor vehicle is not necessarily negligence and to sound a horn does not necessarily negative rashness or negligence in driving. Each case must be decided on its own facts. From the mere fact that a motorist strikes a person walking on the road, the presumption cannot be drawn that the accident was caused by the motorist's carelessness. Such a presumption is ill-founded as a great many such occurrences are due to accidents. If the car was being driven at an excessive speed, that in itself would be evidence to show that there was negligence. But where the car was being driven at about twenty to twenty-five miles an hour, such a speed cannot be said to argue ipso facto that there was negligence¹. Where the accused having taken his car in court-precincts reversed it and moved forward and while doing so the left rear wheel of his car ran over the shoulder of a person who was sleeping under a tree and he was convicted of an offence under this section read with s. 279 although he had sounded the horn as a warning, it was held that the accused could not be held to be negligent. What a prudent man is likely to assume is that people sitting there were awake and that they would respond to the sound warning of the approach of the car. Only because it was conceivable that there would be some one sleeping at the time and place, no man can reasonably be held culpable if he failed to foresee such an exceptional circumstance.²

CASES.

Sexual intercourse causing injury to wife.—Under no law is it a rule that a husband has the absolute right to enjoy the person of his wife without regard to the question of safety to her. Hence, where a husband had sexual intercourse with his wife, aged eleven years, and she died from the injuries thereof, he was held guilty of causing grievous hurt by doing a rash act under this section.³ This case led to the passing of Act IV of 1891. See s. 375, infra.

Death caused by allowing cart to go unattended.—Where a person, by allowing his cart to proceed unattended along a road, ran over a boy who was sleeping on the road, it was held that he had committed an offence under s. 337 or under this section although the boy might have contributed to his own injury by going to sleep on the side of the road.⁴

Running over by carriage.—Where the accused's carriage, which was driven at an ordinary pace, on a dark night, knocked down an old deaf man and killed him, it was held that the question for the Court was whether there was any evidence that the death of the deceased was induced by an act negligently or rashly directed by the accused. If there was no such evidence the accused could not be convicted.⁵ It was held similarly where a boy was run over by a motor lorry which was driven at a moderate speed on the correct side of the road.⁶

Negligence in discharging gun.—The accused, who owned a paddy field, discharged a gun in the direction of a footpath, close to his field, through which the complainant was passing. The complainant was wounded in his leg and had to be treated in the hospital and his leg amputated. The accused knew that the footpath was generally used by the public. It was held that the accused was guilty of culpable negligence and was guilty under this section.⁷

Allowing unlicensed person to drive a car recklessly.—A motor truck was being driven by A who had no license for driving. B, who was the driver of the truck and had a driving license was sitting nearby. The truck, while being thus driven, struck a telegraph pole and hit a passerby one of whose legs got crushed and had to be amputated to save his life. A was convicted under this section. As to the liability of B it was held that he could be convicted for abetment. B, who was in charge of the motor truck, placed it under the control of A with actual knowledge that he had no license to drive a motor vehicle, and constructive knowledge that he was not trained to drive any motor vehicle. But for the fact that B permitted him to drive the truck, A could not have committed the offence that he did. B must be presumed to have known that A who had no license to drive could not be trusted with the control of the truck in motion without grave peril to the persons using the public road and that an accident was highly probable. B was guilty of negligence.⁸

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1), (2), (3) as those for s. 336, and further (4) that such act caused grievous hurt.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable when permission is given by the Court before which a prosecution is pending—Triable by Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Where a motor driver is being prosecuted for an offence under this section it cannot be said that the car has been used by the accused for the commission of the offence within the meaning of s. 516A, Criminal Procedure Code, and it is illegal for a Magistrate to detain the motor car pending conclusion of the trial.⁹

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, caused grievous hurt to AB by doing an act, to wit—, so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 338 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

Of Wrongful Restraint and Wrongful Confinement.

The provisions under this head are for the punishment of offences, in which the offender, although he may have no design against human life, and no intention to inflict bodily hurt, either wholly deprives the injured person of his freedom or in some degree abridges his personal liberty. The personal restraint or confinement may, in some cases, be so slight as to deserve little more than a nominal punishment; but the arbitrary imprisonment of a person, which is often a quiet and convenient mode of persecuting him, is a most serious offence, deserving of exemplary punishment.¹⁰

339. Whoever voluntarily obstructs any person¹ so as to prevent that person from proceeding in any direction in which that person has a right to proceed,² is said wrongfully to restrain that person.

Exception.—The obstruction of a private way over land or water which a person in good faith believes himself to have a lawful right to obstruct, is not an offence within the meaning of this section.

ILLUSTRATION.

A obstructs a path along which Z has a right to pass, A not believing in good faith that he has a right to stop the path. Z is thereby prevented from passing. A wrongfully restrains Z.

COMMENT.

Wrongful restraint means the keeping of a man out of a place where he wishes to be, and has a right to be.¹¹ 'Restraint' implies abridgment of the liberty of a person against his will. Where he is deprived of his will-power by sleep or otherwise he cannot, while in that condition, be subjected to any restraint.¹²

The slightest unlawful obstruction to the liberty of the subject to go when and where he likes to go, provided he does so in a lawful manner, cannot be justified, and is punishable under this section.¹³

The following illustrations, given in the original Draft Penal Code,¹⁴ elucidate the meaning of this section :—

(a) A builds a wall across a path along which Z has a right to pass. Z is thereby prevented from passing. A wrongfully restrains Z.

(b) A illegally omits to take proper order with a furious buffalo which is in his possession, and thus voluntarily deters Z from passing along a road along which Z has a right to pass. A wrongfully restrains Z.

(c) A threatens to set a savage dog at Z, if Z goes along a path along which Z has a right to go. Z is thus prevented from going along that path. A wrongfully restrains Z.

(d) In the last illustration, if the dog is not really savage, but if A voluntarily causes Z to think that it is savage, and thereby prevents Z from going along the path, A wrongfully restrains Z.

From these illustrations it will appear that a person may obstruct another by causing it to appear to that other impossible, difficult, or dangerous to proceed, as well as by causing it actually to be impossible, difficult, or dangerous for that other to proceed.

These illustrations were subsequently dropped as they were severely criticised but they indicate that the obstruction mentioned in the section does not mean physical obstruction alone but may mean show of force or threat which will induce a man to change his course. Thus, where the accused removed a ladder and thereby detained a person on the roof of a house, he was held to have committed 'wrongful restraint.'¹⁵

Ingredients.—The section requires two essentials :—

1. Voluntary obstruction of a person.

2. The obstruction must be such as to prevent that person from proceeding in any direction in which he has a right to proceed.

1. 'Voluntarily obstructs any person.'—This section relates to voluntary obstruction by a person and not to obstructions which are not voluntarily continued by the persons accused of the obstruction throughout the time the obstruction lasts.¹⁶ See s. 39 as to the meaning of 'voluntarily.'

A verbal prohibition or remonstrance does not amount to such obstruction.¹⁷ Mere direction or demonstration will not constitute wrongful restraint.¹⁸ But physical presence is not necessary. Where, therefore, the complainant and his wife and daughter occupied a house and during their temporary absence the accused put a lock on the outer door and thereby obstructed them from getting into the house, it was held that the accused was guilty of wrongful restraint.¹⁹ Merely ploughing up a path over which a person has a right to pass will not amount to obstruction.²⁰

'Person.'—The obstruction should be to any person. Obstruction of a vehicle alone (when no men are obstructed) cannot amount to wrongful restraint. Where the complaint against the accused was that they prevented certain carts from proceeding along the public road and there was no evidence to show that the owners of the carts or the carters or any one else were themselves prevented from proceeding along the public road or wherever else they might have wished to go, it was held that the action of the accused did not come within the mischief of s. 341 inasmuch as that section is to be found in Chap. XVI of the Code which deals with offences affecting the human body, and it expressly makes punishable wrongful restraint of any person and not of any vehicle or anything of that sort.²¹ The Madras High Court has, however, held that voluntary obstruction of a vehicle in which persons are travelling would amount to the offence of wrongful restraint of the person in the vehicle. The fact that the person or persons may get down and then be left at liberty to proceed on their way unmolested is immaterial. If the person is prevented from proceeding at the moment of restraint, the terms of this section are satisfied.²²

2. 'Prevent that person from proceeding in any direction in which that person has a right to proceed.'—The section requires that the obstruction should be so complete and successful as to prevent the person obstructed from proceeding in any direction in which he has a right to proceed. The wrong here defined is a wrong against the person, and is not completed where the person is at liberty to go in any direction he pleases. Thus, where the complainant driving a bullock-cart was obstructed from taking his cart through the passage, but there was no obstruction to the complainant passing through the passage alone without the cart, it was held that there could be no conviction for wrongful restraint for though the complainant was hindered from driving his cart through the passage, he himself was unobstructed.²³ Where the accused took away the licenses from the complainants (boatmen) with the result that they were not permitted by the authorities to ply their boats beyond a certain stage in the channel, it was held that it did not amount to wrongful restraint. The Court said: "What section 339, Indian Penal Code, contemplates is that there must be obstruction attributable directly to the person charged, and the legislature apparently did not intend to include within the scope of the section an act which in its remote and indirect consequence might obstruct the free movement of a person."²⁴

'Proceeding.'—The word "proceed" in this section and s. 340 is not confined to the case of a person who can walk on his own legs or can move by physical means within his own power. It includes the case of proceeding by outside agency, which in the case of a baby means the agency of its natural protector or guardian. If a baby is kept shut up, so that its natural protector cannot get at it, it is a case of wrongful confinement.²⁵

Public streets.—All members of the public have equal rights in public streets and no one section of the community can interdict another section of it from the lawful use of such streets. Where the accused, a Brahmin, stopped the complainant, a convert to Arya Samaj, in a street and took him to task for passing along that street, it was held that he was guilty of wrongful restraint.¹ Restraining a horse on which a person is riding so as to prevent him from proceeding at the moment of restraint is wrongful restraint.² A conviction for obstructing a person in proceeding along a path lying over the accused's private land in the exercise of the former's right as a villager can only be sustained when a customary right of way residing in the villagers in respect of the path in question has been proved. Such a right is not sufficiently proved by the oral testimony of two or three persons who are only able to say that the path has been used by the villagers for over twenty years and in view of the Exception to s. 339 which excepts cases of good faith in the obstructor, no offence is established merely by such evidence.³

Bona fide claim.—If an act is done in good faith under a belief that it is justified by law, a conviction under this section will not stand.⁴ Voluntarily obstructing any person from entering upon land in possession of another under bona fide colour of title and possession is not such an obstruction which can be made the subject of a criminal prosecution under this section.⁵ A person cannot be convicted of wrongful restraint, if he locks up a house under a bona fide claim to the same.⁶ The accused, one of the joint-owners of a shop, put her lock on the shop, which was let out by the other joint-owner without her consent. The tenant charged the accused with the offence of wrongful restraint in that he was prevented by the lock from entering the shop.

It was held that the accused had committed no offence, inasmuch as she had affixed her lock to a house of which she was the joint-owner and the complainant was no tenant of hers.⁷

Exception.—It is not an offence to erect a wall against one's premises to prevent other persons from passing over it.⁸ If the accused has acted bona fide then no conviction could be made.⁹

CASES.

Wrongful restraint.—Where the complainant was taken to a police-station, registered as a suspect, and passed on in charge of policemen from one police-beat to another;¹⁰ where a police-officer refused to let a person go home until he gave bail;¹¹ where the accused prevented the complainants from proceeding in a certain direction with their carts and exacted from them a sum of money on a false plea;¹² where the accused stopped the complainant by force, catching hold of his bandy bull;¹³ and where the accused prevented the complainant from proceeding in his turn on a road and assaulted him,¹⁴ this offence was held to have been committed.

Where a person either was or pretended to be an intending emigrant and went to a depot and was there treated as such, receiving meals and an advance of money, it was held that these facts did not confer either on the emigration agent or his watchman power to prevent him from leaving the depot when he desired to do so, and a person who restrained him from going out of the depot was guilty of wrongful restraint.¹⁵ The accused, a landlord, prevented a tenant of his, who was holding over, from entering the room which the tenant had rented from the accused. It was held that he was guilty of wrongful restraint, for a tenant holding over had a position recognized by the law, and he had a right to retain possession of the premises he occupied as even against the landlord himself until dispossessed in course of law.¹⁶ The accused, who were co-owners of a well, obstructed another co-owner (complainant) from using the mot to which he had yoked his bullocks on the slope to the well on the ground that he had not paid his share of expenses on the well. It was held that the accused were guilty of wrongful restraint inasmuch as they had obstructed the complainant from proceeding with his bullocks in a direction in which he had a right to proceed with his bullocks.¹⁷

No wrongful restraint.—Where the accused prevented the building of a party-wall between two adjoining backyards;¹⁸ where toll was demanded of cartmen in good faith, and they went away with their bullocks leaving the carts;¹⁹ where the complainant had, for the purpose of removal, placed certain goods upon a cart, and the accused came and turned the cart upside down, and the things fell to the ground, upon which the complainant went away;²⁰ where the accused placed an obstruction in a road over which the complainant had a right of passage for men and cattle, thereby preventing cattle from passing but leaving a portion of the way in such a condition as to be passable by human beings;²¹ where A invited B to his house in order to be ready to give evidence in a judicial proceeding, and A used neither physical coercion nor threat of any kind to detain B in the house, but B from a mere general dislike or dread of giving offence to A remained there;²² where the accused caused Pariahs to stand in a public street in the vicinity of a temple with the object of preventing the complainant from conducting a religious procession from fear of pollution;²³ and where the accused put up a tin projection over the complainant's compound wall so as to hang over his paved courtyard at a height of six feet ten inches above the ground and the projection did not prevent any one moving below it;²⁴ it was held that the act of the accused did not amount to an obstruction within the meaning of this section.

340. Whoever wrongfully restrains any person¹ in such a manner as to prevent that person from proceeding beyond certain circumscribing limits,² is said "wrongfully to confine" that person.

COMMENT.

Ingredients.—The section requires two essentials :—

1. Wrongful restraint of a person.
2. Such restraint must prevent that person from proceeding beyond certain circumscribing limits.

1. 'Whoever wrongfully restrains any person.'—Wrongful confinement, which is a form of wrongful restraint, is the keeping of a man within limits out of which he wishes to go, and has a right to go.²⁵ A decree-holder is guilty of wrongful confinement, if he causes arrest of the judgment-debtor while he is returning from Court under circumstances mentioned in s. 135 of the Civil Procedure Code, and the Court officer who arrests or makes over the warrant of arrest to his subordinate for compliance is also guilty of this offence.¹

2. 'Prevent that person from proceeding beyond certain circumscribing limits.'—There must be a total restraint, not a partial one. If one man merely obstructs the passage of another in a particular direction, whether by threat of personal violence or otherwise, leaving him at liberty to stay where he is or to go in any other direction if he pleases, he cannot be said thereby to imprison him. Imprisonment is a total restraint on the liberty of the person, for however short a time and not a partial obstruction of his will, whatever inconvenience it may bring on him.² A Sub-Inspector conducting an investigation is within the law when he sends for a person to the police-station who can in his opinion give information about a crime and a constable and a watchman, who do no more than bring such a person to the Sub-Inspector and tell him to sit down until the Sub-Inspector sees him, are committing no offence whatever. They are merely obeying the lawful order of their superior officer and cannot be charged with wrongful confinement under s. 342.³

"Proof of actual physical obstruction is not essential to support a charge of wrongful confinement. It must, in each case, be proved that there was at least such an impression produced in the mind of the person detained as to lead him reasonably to believe that he was not free to depart and that he would be forthwith restrained if attempted to do so. The mere threat of some future harm in case of departure would not suffice if he knew that it was open to him to go away and refrained from doing so lest he should suffer such harm. But if the circumstances were such as to justify and to create the belief that he could not depart without being seized immediately, then it would be proper to hold that he was obstructed and confined."⁴

'Prevent that person from proceeding.'—There can be no wrongful confinement when a desire to proceed has never existed, nor can a confinement be wrongful if it was consented to by the person affected,⁵ or if an escape is open to a person if he wished to avail himself of it.⁶ The retaining of a person in a particular place or the compelling of him to go in a particular direction by force of an exterior will overpowering or suppressing in any way his own voluntary action, is an imprisonment on the part of him who exercises that exterior will.⁷ The accused, a District Traffic Superintendent, being under the bona fide impression that the complainant had admitted that he had travelled without a ticket, seized the hand of the complainant and dragged him to the ticket collector and ordered the ticket collector to realize the full fare. It was held that the accused was guilty of wrongful confinement.⁸

'Certain circumscribing limits.'—"A prison may have its boundary large or narrow, visible and tangible, or, though real, still in the conception only; it may itself be moveable or fixed; but a boundary it must have; and that boundary the party imprisoned must be prevented from passing; he must be prevented from leaving that place, within the ambit of which the party imprisoning would confine him, except by prison-breach. Some confusion seems to me to arise from confounding imprisonment of the body with mere loss of freedom : it is one part of the definition of freedom to be able to go whithersoever one pleases; but imprisonment is something more than the mere loss of this power; it includes the notion of restraint within some limits defined by a will or power exterior to our own."⁹ "If, in the course of a night, both ends of a street were walled up, and there was no egress from the house but into the street, I should have no difficulty in saying that the inhabitants were thereby imprisoned; but, if only one end were walled up, and an armed force stationed outside to prevent any scaling of the wall or passage that way, I should feel equally clear that there was no imprisonment. If there were, the street would obviously be the prison; and yet, as obviously, none would be confined to it."¹⁰

Every confinement of a person is an imprisonment, whether it be in a common prison, or in a private house, or in the stocks, or even by forcibly detaining one in public streets.¹¹

Moral force.—Detention through the exercise of moral force, without the accompaniment of physical force or actual conflict, is sufficient to constitute this offence.¹²

Malice.—Malice is not an essential ingredient in the offence of wrongful confinement.¹³

Period of confinement.—The time during which a person is kept in wrongful confinement is immaterial, except with reference to the extent of punishment.¹⁴

Arrest by third persons at direction of police-officer.—If a police-officer, without arresting a person himself, directs some of the neighbours to take charge of him, the police-officer is responsible in the same way as if he had himself made the arrest, the person arrested by his order being in law in his custody.¹⁵

Difference between malicious prosecution and false imprisonment.—It becomes necessary here to consider the difference between s. 211 and this section, i.e. between malicious prosecution and false imprisonment. "The distinction between false imprisonment and malicious prosecution is well illustrated by the case where, parties being before a magistrate, one makes a charge against another, whereupon the magistrate orders the person charged to be taken into custody and detained until the matter can be investigated. The party making the charge is not liable to an action for false imprisonment, because he does not set a ministerial officer in motion, but a judicial officer. The opinion and judgment of a judicial officer are interposed between the charge and the imprisonment. There is, therefore, at once a line drawn between the end of the imprisonment by the ministerial officer and the commencement of the proceedings before the judicial officer. It is fallacious to inquire whether or not the one is severable from the other, until you find some inseparable connection between them."¹⁶ Thus, the question is, does the defendant set a ministerial or a judicial officer in motion? If the former, he may be liable for false imprisonment. If the latter, for malicious prosecution.

C A S E S .

Wrongful confinement.—Where the accused refused to obey an order in writing improperly issued by a police-officer, and the police thereupon took her into custody;¹⁷ where a Superintendent of Police illegally wrote a letter to a person, who was accused of an offence for which he could not be arrested without a warrant, directing him to present himself before a Magistrate, and sent two constables to accompany him, and prevented him from speaking to anyone;¹⁸ where a person discharged by a Magistrate was subsequently re-arrested on the same charge;¹⁹ where a police-officer arrested, without a warrant, a British subject in British India on a charge of criminal breach of trust or other cognizable offence committed outside British India;²⁰ where a Village Magistrate maliciously ordered a certain person, who had resisted the detention of pigs found trespassing, to be arrested;²¹ where a Jail Doctor confined an offender, who was already undergoing imprisonment, in a cell within the jail for the purpose of administering enema against his will;²² where an Abkari Inspector detained a man all night to prevent his being tampered with;²³ where a person living in a town, where medical assistance was available, kept in heavy chains his own brother who was subject to insanity of an intermittent kind and who was found to be sane by the District Judge who ordered his production before the Court;²⁴ where the accused got the complainant who was their debtor arrested and taken to jail by a bailiff during the subsistence of a protection order in his favour;²⁵ and where a person acting under a bona fide belief that another person had abducted a minor girl arrested him and kept him in his own custody instead of taking him to a police-station,¹ the offence of wrongful confinement was held to have been committed.

The accused, a police constable, detained some persons as suspects for several days. They were not fettered, but they were made to stay in a circumscribed limit. Their meals were brought to them, or police or village servants were sent with them to their houses for their meals and they were brought back. It was held that the accused was guilty of wrongful confinement.² Where two police-officers arrested without a warrant a person who was drunk and creating disturbance in a public street, and confined him in the police-station though one of them knew his name and address and it was not found to what extent he was a danger to others or their property, it was held that the arrest having been made by the police-officer without a warrant, for a non-cognizable offence, their action amounted to wrongful confinement, unless it was justified under the provisions of the Code relating to the right of private defence or under s. 81,³ as was, in fact, held by the Court. Accused No. 1 brought a woman, who was his kept mistress, from Kolhapur and kept her with accused No. 2, a brothel-house-keeper in Bombay. On previous occasions too he had supplied women to accused No. 2 to be used as prostitutes. The woman was made to live as a prostitute in the house, the entrance to which was guarded, and a watch was kept over her movements. Occasionally she was allowed to go out under surveillance. It was held that both the accused were guilty of wrongfully confining the woman.⁴

Mistaken exercise of power by police-officer.—Where a person went to a police-station to lodge a complaint, and the police-officer, in consequence of something, restrained the person until he consulted his superior, and then discharged him on his own recognizance, he was held to have committed no offence.⁵ The accused, a police-officer, came down to Bombay from up-country with a warrant to arrest a person. After reasonable inquiries and on well-founded suspicion he arrested the complainant under the warrant believing in good faith that he was the person to be arrested. The complainant having proceeded against the accused for wrongful confinement, it was held that the accused had committed no offence since he was protected by s. 76.⁶

No wrongful confinement.—Under Government orders the ex-Maharaja of Nabha was restricted in his movements to the municipal limits of Kodaikanal. The Maharani of Nabha was to leave Kodaikanal for Madras in a motor car, but the Superintendent of Police, Madura, was wrongly informed that the ex-Maharaja was going with his family to Madras. He telephoned to a Sub-Inspector of Police to prevent the ex-Maharaja from leaving Kodaikanal. The Sub-Inspector misunderstood the message and took it to be a direction to prevent the Maharani from leaving Kodaikanal. When the Maharani came with her daughter by car to the Kodaikanal railway station to leave for Madras by train, the Sub-Inspector requested her not to board the train which had arrived and posted two constables near the railway compound to prevent her car being taken out of the compound. In a suit for damages by the Maharani and her daughter alleging that the acts of the police-officer were irregular and without justification, it was held that no wrongful confinement could be said to have taken place. The offences of wrongful restraint and wrongful confinement are offences affecting the human body and cannot be said to have been committed if a person is not himself restrained or confined but the liberty of going in the conveyance in which he wishes to go or of taking the articles which he wishes to carry and without which he is not willing to proceed is denied to him.⁷

Legal arrest.—Where the arrest is legal, the police-officer making the arrest cannot be successfully proceeded against on a charge under this section.⁸ An officer arresting a judgment-debtor under a warrant which directs him to produce the judgment-debtor when arrested before the Court with all convenient speed, is not guilty of wrongful confinement if, having effected the arrest when the Court is not sitting, he confines him in the house of the judgment-creditor till the next sitting of the Court.⁹ If a debtor arrested in execution of a civil process protests to the peon arresting him that he has been attending a trial going on at the time as a party and is, as such, exempt from arrest under s. 135 (2) of the Civil Procedure Code, the peon does not commit an offence under s. 342, nor any other offence, if he makes no investigation as to the truth of the plea but arrests the judgment-debtor and produces him before the Court. The decree-holder on whose identification the judgment-debtor is arrested in such circumstances does not commit an offence under s. 342 read with s. 109 inasmuch as the peon commits no offence. Where a judgment-debtor arrested in execution of a civil process was taken forthwith to the Court which had issued the warrant but could not be produced till two hours later because the Munsiff was engaged in hearing a case, it was held that there was no wrongful detention during the interval.¹⁰

The obstructor must intend or know or have reason to believe it to be likely that the means adopted would cause the obstruction of the complainant.¹³

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

It is not advisable to try summarily public servants whose whole career might depend upon the result.¹⁴

Magistrate cannot order removal of obstruction.—A Magistrate, while convicting an accused person for wrongfully restraining a person by the erection of a hut or by any similar act of obstruction, cannot pass an order, under this section, that the hut or other means of obstruction should be removed. An order for the removal of the hut could be passed under s. 522 of the Criminal Procedure Code.¹⁵

Punishment.—“The offence of wrongful restraint, when it does not amount to wrongful confinement, and when it is not accompanied with violence, or with the causing of bodily hurt, is seldom a serious offence, and we propose, therefore, to visit it with a light punishment.”¹⁶

342. Whoever wrongfully confines any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Punishment for wrongful confinement.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused obstructed the complainant.

(2) That such obstruction was voluntary.

(3) That the effect of such obstruction was to restrain that person from proceeding beyond a certain limit.

(4) That the restraint was wrongful.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable—Triable by Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Separate sentences.—Where the accused were convicted under this section and s. 352, and sentenced separately for each of the offences, the acts found against them being that they seized, dragged, and pushed the complainant to a certain place in order to punish him, it was held that what the accused had been punished for was the whole series of acts, and that series of acts came within the definition both of wrongful confinement and using of criminal force, and accordingly the case fell within the second para. of s. 71.¹⁷ Where wrongful confinement was the common object of an unlawful assembly, and that was the essential ingredient in the constitution of an offence under s. 147, it was held that, having regard to the provisions of s. 71, a separate sentence for wrongful confinement was illegal.¹⁸

Charge.—The charge should run thus :—

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, wrongfully confined AB, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 342 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

343. Whoever wrongfully confines any person for three days or more, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENT.

The period of three days will be counted from the time that the complainant is illegally confined.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1) to (4) as those for s. 342; and further (5) that such restraint⁺ was for a period of three or more days.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable when permission is given by the Court before which the prosecution is pending—Triable by Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—See the form of charge for s. 342. In that form for “confined AB” substitute “confined AB for—days.”

344. Whoever wrongfully confines any person for ten days, or more, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Wrongful confinement for ten or more days.

COMMENT.

Object.—The authors of the Code say : “One aggravating circumstance is the duration of the confinement. Confinement for a quarter of an hour may sometimes be a mere frolic, which would deserve only a nominal punishment, which, indeed, might be so harmless as not to amount to an offence... But wrongful confinement continued during many days will always be a most serious offence. We have attempted to frame the law on this subject in such a manner as to give the offender a strong motive for abridging the detention of his prisoner.”¹⁹ The Law Commissioners observe: “One cannot conceive of a wrongful confinement continued for ten days or more without deliberation and reflection and a special regard to the penal consequences, and when a man sees that by persisting in his offence he is every day becoming liable to a certain additional punishment, the motive to set his prisoner free will grow stronger daily.”²⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1) to (4) as those for s. 342; and further (5) that such restraint was for a period of ten or more days.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—See the form of charge for s. 342. In that form for “confined AB” substitute “confined AB for—days.”

Punishment.—Fine alone is not a legal sentence for a prisoner convicted under this section.²¹

345. Whoever keeps any person in wrongful confinement, knowing that a writ for the liberation of that person has been duly issued, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, in addition to any term of imprisonment to which he may be liable under any other section of this Chapter.

Wrongful confinement of person for whose liberation writ has been issued.

COMMENT.

There must be knowledge on the part of the accused that a writ of liberation has been issued. Mere belief is not sufficient; ‘knowledge’ is a much stronger word than ‘belief’ as the latter is stronger than ‘suspect.’²²

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused kept a person in confinement.
(2) That such confinement was wrongful.

(4) That the accused knew of such writ when he kept the person wrongfully confined.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc..) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, wrongfully confined AB, knowing at the time of such wrongful confinement that a writ for the liberation of the said AB had been duly issued, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 345 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance [or cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court)].

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

346. Whoever wrongfully confines any person in such manner as to indicate an intention that the confinement of such person may not be known¹ to any person interested in the person so confined, or to any public servant,² or that the place of such confinement may not be known to or discovered by any such person or public servant as hereinbefore mentioned, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years in addition to any other punishment to which he may be liable for such wrongful confinement.

Wrongful confinement in secret.

COMMENT.

The offence consists in wrongful confinement, aggravated by the offender's endeavour to deprive his prisoner and those interested in him or bound to protect him of the remedies which the law gives against this wrong.

1. 'Intention that the confinement of such person may not be known'.—In order to render a person liable under this section, it must be shown that the wrongful confinement was of such a nature as to indicate an intention that the person confined should not be discovered. The complainant, a woman, went to the Court to lodge a complaint of ill-treatment and torture against some relatives of the accused. The case not having been finished that day, she was asked to attend the Court the next day. As she was departing she was accosted by the accused who put her into a carriage and drove her away, taking her to various places, all strange and unknown to her at one or other of which she was detained. But a stir having arisen in the meantime on account of her disappearance she was brought back by the accused and produced by them before a pleader, in whose premises she remained till the next day when she was made over to the police. The Sessions Judge convicted the accused under this section but the High Court set aside the conviction on the ground that there was no intention that she should not be discovered and that her confinement was not actual but potential as she was induced but not forced.²³

2. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1) to (4) as those for s. 342; and further (5) that such confinement was secret against (a) any person interested in the captive, or (b) a public servant, or (c) discovery of the place of confinement.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable when permission is given by the Court before which the prosecution is pending—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

²³ The Petition of Sreenath Banerjee, (1882) 9 Cal. 221.

347. Whoever wrongfully confines¹ any person for the purpose of extorting from the person confined, or from any person interested in the person confined, any property or valuable security² or of constraining the person confined or any person interested in such person to do anything illegal or to give any information which may facilitate the commission of an offence,³ shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Wrongful confinement to extort property, or constrain to illegal act.

COMMENT.

This and the next section may be compared with ss. 329 and 330, as the aggravating circumstances mentioned in the former are the same as in the latter.

1. 'Wrongfully confines'.—A head constable in charge of a police outpost agreed to drop proceedings against K, who had been arrested on a certain charge, on condition that K paid to him a sum of money. The head constable sent away K in charge of two chowkidars to procure the money. In order to effect this object the chowkidars subsequently confined K at various places and maltreated him. It was held that it would be impossible to hold the head constable guilty of abetting an offence under this section in the absence of proof that he gave definite orders to that end.²⁴

2. 'Valuable security'.—See s. 30, supra. In Patna if a person places his thumb-impression on a blank sheet of paper, the understanding between him and the person to whom he delivers the paper ordinarily is that it is to be converted into a 'valuable security'. The thumb-impression is regarded as the signature of an illiterate man.²⁵ Where the accused intentionally put the executant in fear of injury to himself and thus dishonestly induced him to place his thumb-impression upon certain blank pieces of papers, it was held that the documents extorted were valuable securities and the accused were guilty under this section.¹

3. 'Offence'.—The word "offence" here means a thing punishable under this Code or any special or local law (s. 40).

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1) to (4) as those for s. 342; and further

(5) that such confinement was for the purpose of (a) extorting property, or a valuable security, or (b) constraining the doing of anything illegal, or (c) giving information which might facilitate the commission of an offence.

(6) That such extortion or constraint was from, or of, the person confined, or someone else interested in him.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, wrongfully confined AB for the purpose of extorting from the said AB (or from a certain person interested in the said AB, to wit, CD) a certain property, to wit—, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 347 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance [or within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court)].

And I hereby direct that you be tried [by the said Court (in cases tried by Magistrate omit these words)] on the said charge.

interested in the person confined to restore or to cause the restoration of any property or valuable security³ or to satisfy any claim or demand, or to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENT.

This section may be compared with s. 330.

1. 'Whoever wrongfully confines'.—The person liable is the person who wrongfully confines. The appellants charged the prosecutor with theft, and he was handed over to the police. It was held that the police, and not the appellants, were responsible for any oppression or extortion practised by the police on the prosecutor while in confinement.² Mere temporary detention of persons at a police-station by the police for purposes of search or investigation or generally for the purpose of enquiry into a crime does not amount to an offence of wrongful confinement, but it may amount to such an offence where the detention is serious and protracted enough to amount in law to a real and unauthorised prevention from proceeding beyond certain circumscribing limits.³ Police-officers during the investigation of a case have necessarily to call persons and keep them from going to some other place where they would prefer to be. But by detaining a person who is not concerned with any investigation for more than twenty-four hours, the police-officer commits an offence and is guilty under this section.⁴

2. 'Offence'.—The word "offence" here means a thing punishable under this Code or any special or local law (s. 40).

3. 'Valuable security'.—See s. 30, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove points (1) to (4) as those for s. 342; and further

(5) that such confinement was for the purpose (a) of extorting a confession, or some information, etc., or (b) of constraining the restoration of some property, or (c) valuable security, etc.

(6) That such extortion or constraint was from, or of, the person confined, or some other person interested in him.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first class.

Of Criminal Force and Assault.

349. A person is said to use force to another if he causes motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion to that other, or if he causes to any substance such motion, or change of motion, or cessation of motion as brings that substance into contact with any part of that other's body, or with anything which that other is wearing or carrying, or with anything so situated that such contact affects that other's sense of feeling : Provided that the person causing the motion, or change of motion, or cessation of motion, causes that motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion in one of the three ways hereinafter described :

First.—By his own bodily power.

Secondly.—By disposing any substance in such a manner that the motion or change or cessation of motion takes place without any further act on his part, or on the part of any other person.

Thirdly.—By inducing any animal to move, to change its motion, or to cease to move.

C O M M E N T .

This expression gives an elaborate explanation of the expression "to use force". The term 'force' contemplates the use of force to a person and not to a thing.⁶ The illustrations to s. 350 exemplify the various clauses of the definition given in this section.

1. 'Animal'.—See s. 47, supra.

350. Whoever intentionally uses force to any person,¹ without that person's consent,² in order to the committing of any offence,³ or intending by the use of such force to cause, or knowing it to be likely that by the use of such force he will cause injury, fear or annoyance to the person to whom the force is used,⁴ is said to use criminal force to that other.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) Z is sitting in a moored boat on a river. A unfastens the moorings, and thus intentionally causes the boat to drift down the stream. Here A intentionally causes motion to Z, and he does this by disposing substances in such a manner that the motion is produced without any other action on any person's part. A has therefore intentionally used force to Z; and if he has done so without Z's consent, in order to the committing of any offence, or intending or knowing it to be likely that this use of force will cause injury, fear or annoyance to Z, A has used criminal force to Z.

(b) Z is riding in a chariot. A lashes Z's horses, and thereby causes them to quicken their pace. Here A has caused change of motion to Z by inducing the animals to change their motion. A has therefore used force to Z; and if A has done this without Z's consent, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby injure, frighten or annoy Z, A has used criminal force to Z.

(c) Z is riding in a palanquin. A, intending to rob Z, seizes the pole and stops the palanquin. Here A has caused cessation of motion to Z, and he has done this by his own bodily power. A has therefore used force to Z; and as A has acted thus intentionally, without Z's consent, in order to the commission of an offence, A has used criminal force to Z.

(d) A intentionally pushes against Z in the street. Here A has by his own bodily power moved his own person so as to bring it into contact with Z. He has therefore intentionally used force to Z; and if he has done so without Z's consent, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby injure, frighten or annoy Z, he has used criminal force to Z.

(e) A throws a stone, intending or knowing it to be likely that the stone will be thus brought into contact with Z, or with Z's clothes, or with something carried by Z, or that it will strike water, and dash up the water against Z's clothes or something carried by Z. Here, if the throwing of the stone produce the effect of causing any substance to come into contact with Z, or Z's clothes, A has used force to Z; and if he did so without Z's consent, intending thereby to injure, frighten or annoy Z he has used criminal force to Z.

(f) A intentionally pulls up a woman's veil. Here A intentionally uses force to her, and if he does so without her consent, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby injure, frighten or annoy her, he has used criminal force to her.

(g) Z is bathing. A pours into the bath water which he knows to be boiling. Here A intentionally by his own bodily power causes such motion in the boiling water as brings that water into contact with Z, or with other water so situated that such contact must affect Z's sense of feeling. A has therefore intentionally used force to Z; and if he has done this without Z's consent, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury, fear or annoyance to Z, A has used criminal force.

(h) A incites a dog to spring upon Z, without Z's consent. Here, if A intends to cause injury, fear or annoyance to Z, he uses criminal force to Z.

COMMENT

The preceding section defined 'force'. This section says that 'force' becomes criminal when it is used (1) without consent and in order to the committing of an offence, or (2) when it is intentionally used to cause injury, fear, or annoyance to another to whom the force is used. The term 'force' as defined here applies to force used in connection with the human body.⁷

The term 'criminal force' includes what in English law is called "battery". It will, however, be remembered that 'criminal force' may be so slight as not to amount to an offence (s. 95), and it will be observed that 'criminal force' does not include anything that the doer does by means of another person. The definition of 'criminal force' is so wide as to include force of almost every description of which a person is the ultimate object.⁸ It contemplates the use of force to a person and not to a thing.⁹

The present definition of 'criminal force' was called 'assault' in the original Code. Speaking of it, the framers of the Code say: "We have found great difficulty in giving a definition of assault, and are by no means satisfied with that which we now offer. As, however, it at present appears to us to include all that we mean to include, and to exclude all that we mean to exclude, we have adopted it in spite of the objections which we feel to its harsh and quaint phraseology. We have adopted it with the less scruple, because we trust that the illustrations will render every part of it intelligible to an attentive reader.

"A large proportion of the acts which we have designated as assaults will be offences falling under the heads of hurt and restraint. Thus, a stab with a knife is an offence falling under the head of hurt, and it is also an assault. The seizing a man by the collar, and thus preventing him from proceeding on his way, is unlawful restraint, and is also an assault. But there will be many assaults which it is absolutely necessary to punish, yet which cause neither bodily hurt nor unlawful restraint. A man who impertinently puts his arm round a lady's waist, who aims a severe stroke at a person with a horsewhip, who maliciously throws a stone at a person, squirts dirty water over a person, or sets a dog at a person, may cause no hurt and no restraint, yet it is evident that such acts ought to be prevented".¹⁰ any part of that other's body'; ills. (f) and (g), 'other's sense of feeling'. Clause (1) of s. 349 is illustrated by ills. (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g); cl. 2, by ill. (a); and cl. 3, by ills. (b) and (h).

Ingredients.—The section requires the following essentials:—

1. The intentional use of force to any person.
2. Such force must have been used without that person's consent.
3. It must have been used—
 - (a) in order to the committing of any offence; or
 - (b) with the intention to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will cause, injury, fear or annoyance to the person to whom it is used.

1. 'Whoever intentionally uses force to any person'.—The use of force must be intentional. The definition of "force" contemplates the presence of the person using the force and of the person to whom the force is used. When a person breaks open the lock of a house in the absence of the person in possession of the house and takes possession thereof, the possession taken is without any force or show of force.¹¹ The definition of 'criminal force' contemplates criminal force being used as against a person and does not take into account such force being used as against any matter or substance. Thus in causing dispossession of any person from immoveable property by means of an offence, the offence must be attended by criminal force to the person.¹² To strike a pot which a man is carrying and which is in contact with that man's body, constitutes the offence of criminal force if it is done to cause him fear, annoyance, etc., and if that person is a public servant in the discharge of his duties, the offence is punishable under s. 353.¹³

Where the accused went to the field of another and cut the crops sown by him and on the latter resisting they raised their sticks to strike him and that other ran away to save himself, it was held that the accused were guilty of using force by means of bodily power within the meaning of this section.¹⁴ The accused having been brought to a certain place to serve as a coolie attempted to run away, but was obstructed and prevented from doing so by a peon. In the struggle which ensued the accused seized the peon by the wrist, and attempted to get away. It was held that the accused did not commit this offence as he had acted in self-defence.¹⁵

2. 'Without that person's consent.'—Mere submission by one who does not know the nature of the act done cannot be consent.¹⁶ See s. 90 as to the meaning of 'consent.'

On a charge of assault consent can never be a defence when the alleged assault consists in an unlawful act. It is an unlawful act to strike another person with such a degree of violence that bodily harm is a probable consequence. To this rule there are a number of well-recognized exceptions, such as blows struck in the course of friendly athletic contests or rough but innocent horseplay, but blows struck for the purpose of gratifying a perverted sexual passion do not come within any of the recognised exceptions to the general rule. The accused, in order to gratify a perverted sexual passion, beat a girl with a cane, which left seven or eight red marks on her body. He was charged with indecent assault and common assault and at the trial relied on the defence of consent. It was held that where an act was in itself unlawful, consent could never be an available defence. The conviction was, however, quashed as it was not conclusively proved that the accused's act was unlawful in itself and as there was inadequate direction in the summing-up to the jury.¹⁷

3. 'In order to the committing of any offence'.—The force must have been used for the purpose of committing an offence. See s. 40 as to the definition of 'offence'.

4. 'Intending by the use of such force to cause, ... injury, fear or annoyance to the person to whom the force is used'.—The force must have been used with the intention to cause or knowing it to be likely that by the use of such force he will cause injury, fear, or annoyance to the person to whom the force is used.

Diseased spleen.—Where the accused struck a person, who had an enlarged spleen, in the course of a quarrel, and that person died owing to his bodily infirmity, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section.¹⁸ For other similar cases, see ss. 319 and 320.

Rescuing persons arrested by police.—Two police constables in the bona fide execution of their duty carried out an arrest under a warrant which, unknown to them, was in fact not legally issued; whereupon certain persons came up and rescued the prisoner and tore up the warrant but did not cause hurt to any one. It was held that the rescuers were guilty of using criminal force.¹⁹

351. Whoever makes any gesture, or any preparation¹ intending or knowing it to be likely² that such gesture or preparation will cause any person present to apprehend that he who makes that gesture or preparation is about to use criminal force to that person, is said to commit an assault.

Assault.

Explanation.—Mere words do not amount to an assault. But the words which a person uses may give to his gestures or preparations such a meaning as may make those gestures or preparations amount to an assault.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A shakes his fist at Z, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause Z to believe that A is about to strike Z. A has committed an assault.

(b) A begins to unloose the muzzle of a ferocious dog, intending, or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause Z to believe that he is about to cause the dog to attack Z. A has committed an assault upon Z.

(c) A takes up a stick, saying to Z, "I will give you a beating." Here, though the words used by A could in no case amount to an assault, and though the mere gesture, unaccompanied by any other circumstances, might not amount to an assault, the gesture explained by the words may amount to an assault.

COMMENT.

It is not every threat, when there is no actual personal violence, that constitutes an assault. There must, in all cases, be the means of carrying the threat into effect. If a person is advancing in a threatening attitude, with an intention to strike another, so that his blow will almost immediately reach the other, if he is not stopped, then, this is an assault in point of law, though, at the particular moment when he is stopped, he is not near enough for his blow to take effect.²⁰

The offence of assault is one that is committed against a person and not against the public. It does involve a breach of the peace.²¹

A person in uniform, be he officer, N.C.O. or private, is no more than any one else entitled to assault another subject of the King whether in peace or time of war.²²

Assault: criminal force.—An assault is something less than the use of criminal force, the force being cut short before the blow actually falls. It seems to consist in an attempt or offer by a person having present ability with force to do any hurt or violence to the person of another. And it is committed whenever a well-founded apprehension of immediate peril from a force already partially or fully put in motion is created. An assault is included in every use of criminal force.²³

English law.—An assault consists in an attempt or offer by a person having present ability, with force, to do any hurt or violence to the person of another. Striking at another with a cane, stick, or fist, although the blow misses, drawing a sword or bayonet, or throwing a bottle or glass with intent to wound or strike, presenting a loaded gun at a man within range, or any other act indicating an intention to use violence against the person of another, is an assault. Battery is defined to be "any least hurt or violence unlawfully and wilfully or culpably done to the person of another."

Ingredients.—The action requires two things:—

1. Making of any gesture or preparation by a person in the presence of another.

2. Intention or knowledge of likelihood that such gesture or preparation will cause the person present to apprehend that the person making it is about to use criminal force to him.

1. 'Makes any gesture, or any preparation'.—See ill. (a) which illustrates that gestures which cause a person to apprehend that the person making them is about to use criminal force amount to an assault. It is an assault to point a loaded pistol at any one.²⁴ Mere utterance of some threats, unaccompanied by any gesture or preparation suggesting intention to use criminal force does not constitute this offence.²⁵

See ill. (b) as to 'preparation'. Though mere preparation to commit a crime is not punishable (see Comment on s. 511, infra) yet preparation with the intention specified in this section amounts to an assault. If a person throws bricks into the house of another this would be a gesture as it would cause the person into whose house the bricks are thrown to apprehend that criminal force was about to be used against him.¹ Where the accused went away threatening the officers that he would return and teach them a lesson and soon afterwards he did come back armed with a lathi along with some other persons, and came sufficiently close to the officers so as to raise in their minds a reasonable apprehension that actual force was likely to be used, it was held that the act of the accused came within the definition of "assault" and that his conviction under s. 353 was justified.²

According to the definition of assault in this section, the apprehension of the use of criminal force must be from the person making the gesture or preparation and if that apprehension arises not from that person but from somebody else it does not amount to assault on the part of that person. Further according to s. 349, criminal force cannot be said to be used by one person to another by causing change in the position of another human being. Where, therefore, the accused himself did nothing which could come under the definition of assault but simply made a gesture at which his followers advanced a little forward towards the complainant in a threatening manner, it was held that he was not guilty of assault under s. 353.³

2. 'Intending or knowing it to be likely'.—Intention is the gist of the offence. The gesture or preparation must be of such a nature that the person in whose presence it is made should apprehend that criminal force would be used to him. Throwing a bottle into a house, among the inmates, with the intention of hurting or frightening them, constitutes assault.⁴ Where one of the accused hit a constable and the others surrounded the constable in a threatening manner, it was held that that was not sufficient to convict the others of assault.⁵

The appellant met the respondent in the street and tendered him an order for discovery, which had been made against the respondent in a County Court action, the appellant acting on behalf of the solicitor to the other party to the action. The respondent refused to accept the document, and the appellant thrust it into the inner-fold of the respondent's coat. It was held that, as the appellant was entitled to serve the respondent personally and as there was no evidence that the appellant touched the respondent more than was necessary to bring the document home to the respondent, the appellant was not guilty of an assault on the respondent.⁶

Mere words do not amount to an assault, but the words which the party threatening uses at the time may either give his gestures such a meaning as may make them amount to an assault, or, on the other hand, may prevent them from being held to amount to an assault. In the latter case the effect of the words must be such as clearly to show the party threatened that the party threatening has no present intention to use immediate criminal force.⁷ A preparation taken with words which would cause a person to apprehend that criminal force would be used to him, if he persisted in a particular course of conduct, does not amount to an assault. There must be evidence to show that the accused was about to use criminal force to him then and there.⁸ See ill. (c).

352. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person otherwise than on grave and sudden provocation given by that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Punishment for assault or criminal force otherwise than on grave provocation. *Explanation.*¹—Grave and sudden provocation will not mitigate the punishment for an offence under this section, if the provocation is sought or voluntarily provoked by the offender as an excuse for the offence, or if the provocation is given by anything done in obedience to the law, or by a public servant, in the lawful exercise of the powers of such public servant, or if the provocation is given by anything done in the lawful exercise of the right of private defence.²

Whether the provocation was grave and sudden enough to mitigate the offence, is a question of fact.

COMMENT.

This section provides punishment for assault or use of criminal force when there are no aggravating circumstances.

The forcible taking of a person's thumb impressions amounts to an offence under this section.⁹

1. Explanation.—See Comment on Exception 1 to s. 300.

2. 'Right of private defence'.—See ss. 96 to 100 and Comments thereon.

A Sub-inspector in charge of a police-station unauthorisedly proposed to search the house of one S and his brothers. The latter stood up to him and refused to allow the search to be made. They were armed with lathis and assumed a threatening attitude. One of them, S, actually raised his lathi to strike the Sub-Inspector. It was held that S was guilty under this section.¹⁰

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the accused made a gesture or preparation to use criminal force.

(2) That the same was made in the presence of the complainant.

(3) That he intended, or knew, that it was likely that such gesture, etc., would cause the complainant to apprehend that such criminal force would be used.

(4) That such gesture, etc., did cause the complainant to apprehend the same.

(5) That the accused received no grave or sudden provocation from the complainant.

To substantiate a charge of assault on a particular person, it is not enough to prove that the words used and the preparations made by the accused were calculated to cause that person to apprehend that criminal force would be used to him, if he persisted in a certain course of conduct ; there must be evidence to show that the accused was about to use criminal force to him then and there.¹¹

Or prove (1) that the accused used force¹² to the complainant.

(2) That he did so intentionally.

(3) That he used such force, without the complainant's consent.

(4) That he did so in order to commit an offence; or that he thereby intended to cause, or knew that he would thereby be likely to cause, injury, fear or annoyance to the complainant.

(5) That he received no grave or sudden provocation from the complainant.

Where two persons bring cases of mutual assault, the Magistrate cannot use evidence given in one case as evidence in the other and a conviction based on such evidence cannot be upheld.¹³

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate—Triable summarily.

Autrefois acquit.—A person who is tried and discharged for the offence of using criminal force under this section cannot again, upon the same complaint, be tried for causing hurt, for, under whatever denomination the offence is classed, it is the one offence of assault.¹⁴

Complaint.—A Munsiff held an inquiry under s. 476, Criminal Procedure Code, and having come to the conclusion that the accused had committed offences under s. 183 and this section in connection with certain execution proceedings sent the case to the District Magistrate who transferred it to a Deputy Magistrate. The Deputy Magistrate acquitted the accused on the ground that there was no sanction. On appeal, the High Court held that with regard to s. 183 the Magistrate ought to have proceeded with the case according to law, and that with regard to this section no sanction was required.¹⁵

Punishment.—A sentence inflicting a fine of Rs. 50, and awarding imprisonment for one month in default of payment of fine, was held to be illegal with reference to s. 65 and this section.¹⁶

If there is grave provocation the Court will generally inflict a light punishment.

353. Whoever assaults¹ or uses criminal force² to any person being a public servant³ in the execution of his duty as such public servant,⁴ or with intent to prevent or deter that person from discharging his duty as such public servant, or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by such person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Assault or criminal force to deter public servant from discharge of his duty.

COMMENT.

If hurt is caused under the circumstances mentioned in the section then either s. 332 or s. 333 will apply.

1. 'Assaults'.—See s. 351, supra. 2. 'Criminal force'—See s. 349, supra. To strike a pot which a man is carrying and which is in contact with that man's body constitutes the offence of criminal force if it is done to cause him fear, annoyance, etc., and if that person is a public servant in the discharge of his duties the offence is punishable under this section.¹⁷

3. 'Public servant'.—See s. 21, *supra*¹⁸. A pagi (a village watchman) remunerated by fees paid by the villagers, is a public servant within the meaning of this section.¹⁹ Similarly, a lascar in the Public Works Department distributing water from public irrigation channels is a public servant and persons assaulting him while engaged in distributing water from an irrigation channel are liable to be convicted under this section.²⁰ The accused cannot claim exoneration on the ground that the person whom he assaulted was not attired in the livery which is ordinarily associated with the duty which he claimed to be discharging, if in fact the accused knew him to be a public servant acting in the execution of his duty as such servant.²¹ Until a member of the Civic Guard has been called out for duty under s. 4 of Ordinance VIII of 1940 and until any order calling him out has been notified in a Gazette as required by the Ordinance, he cannot be called a public servant. Where a person found drinking and quarrelling in a public street inflicted injury on a member of the Civic Guard while attempting to arrest him, it was held that as the Civic Guard had not been properly and legally called out for duty, he was not authorised to exercise any of the special powers of a police-officer, and the accused was justified in resisting his arrest and was not guilty under this section.²²

4. 'In the execution of his duty as such public servant'.—These words mean in the discharge of a duty imposed by law on such public servant in the particular case, and do not cover an act done in good faith under colour of his office.²³ The test is whether the officer at the time of the assault was lawfully discharging a duty imposed on him by law as such. Was he doing what it was his duty to do, when he was assaulted?²⁴ Where there is no illegality on the face of a warrant and it is on the face of it a legal warrant executed by a person who has authority to issue warrants of that nature, it is the duty of the officer executing the warrant to do so and in so doing he acts in the execution of his duty as a public servant.²⁵ An officer exercising his official duties grossly, illegally and in an outrageous manner, cannot be deemed to be a public servant in the execution of his duty so as to bring an assault against such officer within the purview of this section.¹ The public servant must be acting in the execution of his duty as such public servant. A commissioner attempting to give possession under a time-expired warrant has no authority to go upon land in the possession of the party, who resists the execution. The persons offering resistance are not guilty of an offence under this section.² A warrant of arrest signed by an officer of Court not duly authorised to sign such warrants is an illegal one, and resistance to the execution of such warrant cannot be punished under s. 325B and this section.³ If in an execution warrant sought to be executed, the date on or before which it is to be executed and the date on or before which it is to be returned to the Court is not specified, the warrant is bad. Thus, the warrant being illegal, a person resisting its execution by the Amin commits no offence under this section.⁴ A vaccinator who vaccinates in a place, where vaccination is not compulsory is not discharging any duty under the law when attempting to vaccinate a child. A person, therefore, who prevents a vaccinator from vaccinating a child, in a place where vaccination has not been made compulsory, is not guilty of an offence under this section.⁵ Where a cart-owner refused to give his cart for the use of a Forest Settlement Officer, who required it as per executive orders of Government, and assaulted the peon in preventing him from seizing his cart, it was held that he could not be convicted of an offence under this section, because the rules aforesaid had not the force of law, and a public servant acting under them was not acting in the execution of his duty.⁶ A Tahsildar deputed his peon by a written order to procure some camels for the camp of a Settlement Officer. When the peon attempted to seize the camels of the accused he was assaulted by the accused and prevented from seizing the camels. It was held that the accused had committed no offence.⁷ The Collector has no authority to issue a distress warrant to a police-officer under the Income-tax Act of 1922 for arrear of income-tax. A police officer executing such a warrant is not acting in the execution of his duty as a police-officer, and resistance to him does not constitute an offence under this section.⁸ A bill collector cannot be said to be engaged in the lawful discharge of his public duty when he attempts to enforce a warrant for an amount in excess of what could be recovered by distress.⁹ A police constable, at midnight, entered upon the premises of a person who was regarded by the police as a suspicious character, and knocked at his door to ascertain if he was there, whereupon he came out and abused and pushed the constable and lifted a stick as if he were about to hit the constable with it. On a complaint being preferred under this section for using criminal force to deter a public servant in the execution of his duty, it was held that no offence had been committed. The constable was not engaged in the execution of his duty as a public servant and was technically guilty of house-trespass, and his action was calculated to cause annoyance to the inmates of the house, and was insulting to the accused who was justified in causing the slight harm which he had inflicted on the constable.¹⁰

Where a Collector's peon was deputed to keep the peace during a distraint, and, when on the road to execute the order, was assaulted by the accused who attempted to deprive him of his perwana, it was held that the accused had committed an offence under this section.¹¹ A warrant of arrest was issued against R, on a charge of cheating, to the Sub-Inspector within whose jurisdiction R resided. That officer ordered his subordinate constables to be on the lookout for R and arrest him wherever found. One of the constables came across R and proceeded to arrest him informing him of the issue of a warrant against him. The warrant itself was, however, not produced. The accused interfered with the constable in arresting R and managed to prevent his arrest. It was held that under s. 54(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code the constable was empowered to make the arrest without warrant as he had credible information that the person wanted had committed a cognizable offence and in making the arrest he was occupied in the discharge of his duty as a police-officer and any interference with that arrest amounted to obstructing a police-officer in the discharge of his duty and was an offence under this section.¹² A warrant of attachment was endorsed to a bailiff for execution and another bailiff was directed to act with the former in the execution of the warrant. The accused whose property was to be attached under the warrant assaulted the latter bailiff and prevented him from attaching his property. It was held that the second bailiff was acting in good faith as a public servant and the accused was, therefore, guilty of an offence under this section.¹³ If the act of the public servant is authorised by law any resistance will be deemed penal, e.g., assaulting a public servant carrying on a search,¹⁴ or executing a writ of delivery of possession,¹⁵ or resisting a public servant directed to survey the accused's land,¹⁶ or resisting a warrant of arrest¹⁷ or of distraint.¹⁸

Where a police constable, W, was informed by certain constables that gambling was going on in a public place and he was asked to accompany them and assist in arresting the gamblers, and when the party was some paces from the place where the gambling was going on, the accused rushed forward and grappled with W shouting all the time to his companions to run away, it was held that as W was prevented by the accused from proceeding by use of criminal force and the accused having thus deterred W from discharging his duty which was to arrest the gamblers they were guilty under this section.¹⁹ Where at the search of the accused's house by a head constable under the orders of a Sub-Inspector the accused assaulted the constable and prevented his entering the house, it was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section, as the head constable, in conducting the search, was obeying the order of his superior officer, and that s. 165(3) of the Criminal Procedure Code did not apply to the case.²⁰

Defect in warrant.—Where the warrant for the arrest of a person, in execution of a civil process, was not signed in full under s. 251 of the Criminal Procedure Code, but was initialled by the officer issuing it, and was resisted by that person when the officer to whom it was entrusted sought to execute it, it was held that the person was guilty under this section, and the preliminary defect of the warrant formed no defence.²¹ It was held, similarly, where the provisions of s. 82 of the Civil Procedure Code were not complied with before the issuing of a warrant under which the accused was arrested but rescued by his friends.²² But if the warrant issued to a constable to arrest a person is invalid, as, for instance, where it is signed by an Honorary Magistrate who is not the presiding officer under s. 75, Criminal Procedure Code, the person against whom it is issued cannot be convicted under this section if with the assistance of other persons he manages to free himself from the constable and escapes.²³ Similarly, where the provisions of s. 77, Criminal Procedure Code, are not complied with and the warrant is illegal, the person helping the persons arrested to escape is not guilty of any offence.²⁴ A warrant of execution which does not bear a date on or before which it should be executed,²⁵ or where the date fixed for the execution has expired,¹ is not a good warrant. A warrant issued by a Revenue Officer for the arrest of a defaulting witness, which does not contain the name of the person to be arrested, is illegal, and persons assaulting the public servant to help the witness to escape are not guilty of an offence under this section.² Where a warrant required the amin to deliver possession of a certain house, after breaking open the locks, to the purchaser, and the amin broke open the lock and entered the house, and the accused pushed out the amin and his party and assaulted them, it was held that the warrant as it authorised the locks to be broken open was not according to law; that the balance of authority was in favour of the view that the offence committed was not one punishable under this section but only under s. 352; and that as the entry by the amin was over and it did not amount to an offence, the accused had no right of private defence.³

Search without proper order or warrant.—Where the accused resisted a public officer who attempted to search a house, in the absence of a proper written order authorizing him to do so, he was held to have committed no offence under this section⁴ or s. 352.⁵ The Madras High Court has held that a search without a search warrant does not justify an obstruction or resistance to an officer, if he was acting in good faith and without malice.⁶

Where a statute required the recording of reasons before a search was made for an offence committed under the statute, and an officer conducted the search without recording such reasons and he was assaulted by the accused, it was held that the accused was not guilty under this section as the officer making the search could not be said to be acting in the exercise of his powers.⁷

Illegal attachment.—An order allowing attachment of the movable property of a judgment-debtor wherever found, is illegal and resistance to such an attachment is not an offence under this section.⁸ Resistance to illegal attachment and seizure of goods by the police does render the persons resisting liable under this section.⁹

Unlawful act of public servant is good defence.—Where a licensed vaccinator attempted to take lymph from a child of one accused to vaccinate the child of the other, and was assaulted in consequence and received slight injuries, it was held that he was not entitled to take lymph from the arm of any person who objected, and his attempting to do so was unlawful, and that the accused were justified in assaulting him.¹⁰ Where the accused, on a vaccinator ordering a village servant to enter his house and bring out his child for vaccination, threatened to strike with a spade anyone who should enter his house, it was held that he was not guilty of assaulting a public servant under this section.¹¹ An Excise peon with the avowed object of seeing if chandu (a smoking mixture of opium) was not being manufactured, ascended the stairs of accused No. 1's house and looked into the place where accused No. 1 and his wife were sitting. Accused No. 1 on perceiving him came to the door, and shoved him down the steps and followed him, when accused No. 2 came in and hit him. It was found that the peon was not injured in any way. The accused were convicted under s. 353. It was held that the conviction was illegal. Accused No. 1 was justified in turning out the peon for he was not authorized to enter the premises of the accused even with the object of seeing if chandu was being manufactured.¹² Where a surveille on a domiciliary visit being paid to him by a police-officer, refused to allow his thumb impression to be taken, and, on the officer attempting to take it, produced a club saying he would not allow the impression to be taken, and, if any one asked for it, he would break his head, it was held that the act of the surveille did not amount to an assault and that his conviction under this section could not be sustained.¹³ Where, under a warrant authorizing distraint of the property of a person who had defaulted to pay water-tax, the person executing the warrant attempted to distrain the property of the lessee of the defaulter and was assaulted by the lessee, it was held that the lessee could not be convicted under this section.¹⁴ Where the accused, on being asked by a police constable to accompany him to a Sub-Inspector without a written order from the latter under s. 160 of the Criminal Procedure Code, assaulted the constable, it was held that the constable was not acting as a public servant engaged in the discharge of his duty, and that, therefore, the accused was not guilty.¹⁵ A member of a sanitation committee submitted to the Tahsildar a list of persons who had made default in payment of sanitation tax. Two peons accompanied by a watchman went round with the list and when they approached the accused, the latter tore up the list and buffeted the peons out of the premises. It was held that inasmuch as there was no formal writ at all and there was nothing to show that the tax had been demanded by the order of the Board, the accused were entitled to resist the demand and were not guilty of an offence under this section, but were guilty of assault under s. 352.¹⁶ Where the accused caught hold of a Sub-Inspector's hand who wanted to remove his jholu by force, on the refusal of the accused to allow a search of his person, but he was thrown down and beaten by the Sub-Inspector, it was held that the conduct of the Sub-Inspector, who could not have arrested the accused without a warrant and who could not have searched the accused under any provision of law, was very high-handed and utterly without any justification in law and that the accused could not be convicted under this section.¹⁷ Where a police-officer proceeded to demolish a wall and open a drain without any authority from the Magistrate, and the accused resisted the act of the police-officer, it was held that accused did not commit any offence.¹⁸ In executing a writ of attachment before judgment of moveable property in the possession of the defendant (accused), the bailiff attempted to seize by violence money on the person of the accused and in resisting the seizure the accused used criminal force against the bailiff. The accused was charged with an offence under this section and was discharged. It was held that the bailiff while executing the writ in accordance with O. XXI, r. 48, Civil Procedure Code, had no authority to lay violent hands on the person of the accused and seize by force property found thereon.¹⁹

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person assaulted, etc., was a public servant.

(2) That the accused assaulted, or used criminal force to such public servant.

(3) That when the accused assaulted, etc., him, he was acting in the execution of his duty as such public servant; or that such assault, etc., was committed with intent to prevent or deter such public servant from discharging his duty, as such; or that such assault was committed in consequence of something done, or attempted to be done, by such public servant in the lawful discharge of his duty.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

A person cannot, when called upon to meet a charge that he had assaulted a public officer in the discharge of his duties, on failure of that charge, be convicted of an offence of having assaulted a private individual, viz., a witness in the case, especially in the absence of a complaint by that private individual.²⁰ Where an accused has been convicted under this section for assaulting a person whom the Magistrate thought to be a public servant and the appellate Court finds that he was not a public servant there is no bar to the conviction being altered to one under s. 352.²¹

Sanction.—A charge under this section requires no sanction for initiation of proceedings.²²

Non-production of warrant at trial.—One of the accused was convicted under this section, and two others of abetment of an offence under it. But the warrant of attachment under which the public servant was acting was not produced at the trial, nor was any secondary evidence given to show its contents. It was held that in the absence of any evidence as to the terms of the warrant either by the production of the original or in the form of secondary evidence, it was impossible to hold that the conviction was good.²³

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows :—

That you, on or about the——day of——, assaulted [or used criminal force to] AB, a public servant, to wit——, in the execution of his duty as such public servant [or with intent to prevent or deter the said AB from discharging his duty as such public servant], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 353 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

Punishment.—A breach of the peace, even if involving an assault on a public officer of a mild character, unless there be some elements of criminality in it, should not ordinarily be punished by sentences of imprisonment. So far as possible the jails should be kept for the reception of persons who perform criminal acts of not merely a technical but of a criminal character.²⁴

354. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any woman,¹ intending to outrage or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby outrage her modesty,² shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Assault or criminal force to woman with intent to outrage her modesty.

COMMENT.

An indecent assault upon a woman is punishable under this section.²⁵ Rape is punished under s. 376. The offence under this section is of less gravity than the one under s. 376.

Scope.—Assaults committed with the intention of committing rape are not contemplated by this section.

1. 'Woman' is defined as a female human being of any age (s. 10). The accused took a girl of six years to his room, where he made her lie down and he lay on her. The girl immediately screamed and ran away. For this act the accused was convicted and sentenced by the Magistrate under s. 352 and not under this section, on the ground that the girl was too young to have any modesty. It was held that the act of the accused was punishable under this section, for the girl, though young, was a 'woman' as defined by s. 10.¹

2. 'Intending to outrage or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby outrage her modesty.'—There must be intention or knowledge that the woman's modesty will be outraged. What constitutes an outrage to female modesty is nowhere defined. This will differ according to the country and the race to which the woman belongs. It would be an outrage to the modesty of one woman to do her what would be thought nothing of by another. A kiss that would be highly resented by a lady might be no affront to the maid.² To place hands on the shoulder of a woman will be an outrage on the modesty of a Hindu or a Mahomedan woman, but not a European.³ "In construing this section the Court must have regard to the race and the position in life of the particular woman; and women of one nationality may have different standards of modesty from women of another nationality... If women engage in professional work and come out into the open world, they must adopt the standards of ordinary men and women of the world and they cannot expect to retain the same hypersensitive notions of modesty which appealed to their ancestors in purdah... at the same time it is extremely important that men who are brought into professional contact with women should be exceedingly careful not to do anything to outrage the modesty of the women with whom they associate, and that really means that they should be careful not to introduce into their relations with the women any element of sex."⁴

Knowledge that modesty is likely to be outraged is sufficient to constitute the offence without any deliberate intention of having such outrage alone for its object.

For instance, the pulling of a woman by the arm coupled with a request for sexual intercourse, amounts to an offence under this section.⁵ The accused cannot be convicted of this offence where the woman had either no modesty to mention or it was not such as would be outraged by the acts attributed to him.⁶

CASES.

Where a master took indecent liberties with a female scholar it was held that he was guilty of assault though she did not resist.⁷ Making a female patient strip naked under the pretence that the accused, a medical man, could not otherwise judge of her illness was held to be an assault.⁸ Where the accused took off a girl's clothes, threw her on to the ground and then sat down beside her and said nothing to her nor did he do anything more to her, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.⁹ Accused entered a carriage occupied by a lady who was asleep therein and sat down on the berth on which she was sleeping. She woke up and the accused threatened to strangle her if she screamed. He then began to unbutton his trousers and had unfastened the top button when the lady began to struggle with him, whereupon the accused released her and asked her name. On discovering her identity, he ceased to molest her explaining that he had mistaken her for another lady. It was held that the accused was not guilty of an attempt to commit rape but was guilty of an indecent assault under this section.¹⁰ But where the evidence showed that the accused stripped a girl of eighteen or twenty nearly naked and was lying upon her when her cries attracted people to the spot, the accused was held liable under s. 376 for attempt to commit rape and not under this section.¹¹ The accused caught hold of a girl, threw her down, put sand in her mouth, got on her chest and attempted to have intercourse with her. She resisted and cried and her screams attracted a couple of persons seeing whom the accused ran away. It was held that the offence committed was an attempt to commit rape and not one under this section.¹² Where the accused caught hold of a woman by her arm and dragged her, but she raised a hue and cry and some neighbours released her, and there was no evidence as to what the intention of the accused was, it was held that he could not be convicted of abduction (s. 366) but was guilty of an offence under this section.¹³

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) that the person assaulted, etc., was a female.

(2) That the accused assaulted or used criminal force to her.

(3) That he intended thereby to outrage her modesty; or that he knew it to be likely that he would thereby outrage her modesty.

The charge under this section is one which is very easy to make and very difficult to rebut, and when such a charge is made it is necessary to see whether it is supported by independent evidence besides that of the woman herself, or is corroborated by her conduct and the surrounding circumstances and is consistent with ordinary probabilities.¹⁴

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, assaulted [or used criminal force to] AB, a woman, intending to outrage [or knowing it to be likely that you would thereby outrage] the modesty of the said AB by such assault [or criminal force], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 354 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

Punishment.—See the Frontier Crimes Regulation, 1901, ss. 11(3) (d) and 12(2).

355. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person, intending thereby to dishonour that person, otherwise than on grave and sudden provocation¹ given by that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Assault or criminal force with intent to dishonour person, otherwise than on grave provocation.

COMMENT.

The intention to dishonour may be supposed to exist when the assault or criminal force is by means of gross insults, such as kicking a man, pulling a man's nose, assaulting with a shoe, or laying a whip across the shoulders.

Where an accused, while under trial, struck a Sub-Inspector of Police, who was in the witness-box giving evidence against him, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.¹⁵

1. 'Grave and sudden provocation.'—See Exception 1 to s. 300.

Where a low caste woman splashed water of a stream on the body of an orthodox Brahmin while he was performing his sandhya (morning prayer), it was held that the pollution and interruption thus caused in the continuity of his prayers were sufficient to cause grave and sudden provocation so as to justify the use of force such as catching her in order to express his resentment at her conduct, and there could be no inference from such action that there was an intention on the part of the Brahmin to dishonour the woman.¹⁶

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the assault or use of criminal force by the accused.

(2) That the accused intended thereby to dishonour the person assaulted, etc.

(3) That he did not receive grave or sudden provocation from the person so assaulted, etc.

Procedure.—Not cognizable—Summons—Bailable—Compoundable—Triable by Presidency Magistrate, or Magistrate of the first or second class.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the—day of—, at—, assaulted [or used criminal force to] AB, intending by such assault [or criminal force] to dishonour the said AB, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 355 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

356. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person, in attempting¹ to commit theft² on any property which that person is then wearing or carrying, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Assault or criminal force in attempt to commit theft of property carried by a person.

COMMENT.

Object.—This section applies to cases of using criminal force in an attempt to commit theft and not to those cases in which theft has been actually committed.¹⁷ It provides a separate punishment for the rare cases of criminal force used in an attempt to commit theft, and yet not amounting to robbery. The section will generally apply to pickpockets.

1. 'Attempting.'—See s. 511, infra. 2. 'Theft.'—See s. 378, infra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the assault or use of criminal force by the accused.

(2) That the person assaulted, etc., at the time, was wearing, or carrying the property in question.

(3) That the accused committed such assault, etc., in attempting to commit theft of such property (vide ss. 511 and 378).

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Not bailable—Not compoundable—Triable by any Magistrate.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, assaulted [or used criminal force to] AB in attempting to commit theft of certain property, to wit——, which the said AB was then wearing [or carrying], and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 357 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

COMMENT.

This section deals with an assault committed in attempting wrongfully to confine a person.

1. 'Attempting.'—See s. 511, infra.

2. 'Wrongfully to confine.'—See s. 340, supra.

PRACTICE.

Evidence.—Prove (1) the assault, or use of criminal force by the accused.

(2) That he did so in an attempt wrongfully to confine the person assaulted, etc.

Procedure.—Cognizable—Warrant—Bailable—Compoundable when permission is given by the Court before which the prosecution is pending—Triable by any Magistrate.

Charge.—I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:—

That you, on or about the——day of——, at——, assaulted (or used criminal force to) AB, in attempting wrongfully to confine the said AB, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 357 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

358. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person on grave and sudden provocation given by that person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

Assault or criminal force on grave provocation.

Explanation.—The last section is subject to the same Explanation as section 352.

COMMENT.
